HALF PRICE.

In all the literature of the Disciples of Christ, no book has had so large a circulation or such a steady, continuous sale as "On the Rock," by D. R. Dungan. It was first published in 1872, and since that time it has passed through twenty-eight editions. "On the Rock" is a story, the following being a synopsis of the plot:

James Cuggill, the son of a wealthy baronet of Cardigan, Wales, makes a visit to the United States, and is so well pleased with the country that he determines to make it his home, for a few years, at least. James is engaged to be married to Jane Freeman, the beautiful child of wealthy parents. Both are members of the Church of England. A few months after James' arrival in America, he begins to hear rumors and hints of strange things happening at home. It appears that a strange religious sect has begun work near Cardigan. Finally he learns that Jane, together with her parents and brothers have all embraced the new heresy and have been "plunged in water." This intelligence shocks him, but he speedily reflects that the harm done is not beyond repair. He proposes to Jane immediate marriage, hoping thus to remove her from her family and religious associates, and thus to win her back to the English Church. Jane consents, but makes the condition no child of hers is to be baptized or christened in infancy until there is shown her the verse of Scripture where such thing is commanded. James, who has never given much thought to the subject of infant baptism, readily consents to this condition. Jane takes the vessel for New York, and she and James are speedily married. In due time they are blessed with a son, "and then the trouble begins to brew." James begins a search for the passage of Scripture commanding the baptism of infants. Failing to find it, he calls in several clergymen, ranging from Bishops to exhorters, to assist him. These also fail with singular unanimity. The Cuggills return to Wales with the matter still unsettled. It is after much research and more study and thought that James finally is forced to the conclusion that his wife is right, not only as to infant baptism, but as to immersion. Further study of the Scriptures leads the Cuggills, the Freemans and others of Cardi gan to know the way of the Lord yet more perfectly, and to abandon the Baptist Church for the practice of apostolic Chris tianity.

We are now closing out the twenty-eighth edition of "On the Rock." This edition is handsomely and substantially bound in cloth, printed on fine paper and contains 358 pages. The price has always beer $1.50. Notice the reduction.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The posse comitatus, called out to assist the police department in the preservation of order during the strike in this city, has now passed into history. At first only a portion of the posse was retired, but when the discharge of companies began it did not stop until the entire force had been mustered out of service. The boycott against the Transit Company's cars by the unions of the city continues, and in consequence the cars in north and south St. Louis are but slimly patronized. There was talk last week of an organization of manufacturers effected for the purpose of closing down their factories until the boycott on the Transit Company had been declared off, but it is not probable that such an unwise measure will be carried into effect. It would only extend and deepen the spirit of antagonism toward organized capital.

As the street car strike in St. Louis may be said to have practically passed, it may be well to sum up in a few words the different steps in this unfortunate episode in our city's history. In the first place, a strike of such dimensions was made possible by the street car trust, which in turn was made possible by the action of our Municipal Assembly and of our governor. In the second place, the strike itself was unwise in that it included in its demands some things which were unreasonable. No union has the moral or legal right to dictate to the managers of any business who shall and who shall not be employed. In the third place, the strike fell under unwise management. There was a time when the strikers could have settled their differences with the company with credit and profit to themselves. Their leaders from abroad prevented such settlement. In the fourth place, the acts of violence which were committed in most cases, at least not by the strikers themselves, but by their sympathizers, caused public sentiment to be turned against them and made it necessary to call out additional force to preserve order. It ought to be clear now to the strikers themselves that it would have been far better for them to have stated their grievances to the St. Louis public, and appealed to the sense of justice and fairness of the people who are interested in them. instead of putting themselves under the control of outside parties whose interest in them is purely professional. It ought to be equally clear to the managers of the Transit Company that it pays to have a little more consideration for the welfare of the men who render their company service, and to show them such consideration and kindness as will convince them that the company has a higher interest in them than the dollars and cents they may make out of them. The amount of loss to the company, to the strikers, to the city of St. Louis and to business is almost incalculable, and is sufficiently appalling to make sensible people consider whether there is not a better method of settling difficulties between employers and em-

Admiral Seymour arrived at Tien Tsin, June 28th, having lost 62 of his men, being killed, and 312 wounded. Knowing that he was endeavoring to return to Tien Tsin a relief column was sent out and he was rescued. He had been fighting continuously for fifteen days, and during the last ten days on quarter rations. After relieving Admiral Seymour the column continued on toward Pekin, from which city no reliable news has been received since the uprising of the Boxers. The news in relation to the foreign ministers in Pekin, are still conflicting and the facts unknown at this writing. Whether alive or dead, prisoners or protected, is the great question about which the world is now most anxious for knowledge. From 16,000 to 20,000 troops are now reported in the field and others landing. The reports of the massacre of Christians in the inland continue alarming and at the present blockade on news it may be many days yet before the facts are known.

Official word has at last been received from Pekin by way of St. Petersburg and London that the foreign ministers were safe on the 25th of June. Word from Admiral Kempff on the 19th of June says that the ministers were given twenty-four hours to leave Pekin, but refused, and are still there. While there is some relief to the various powers represented in these reports, they are very incomplete and unsatisfactory. Pekin is still enshrouded in mystery. Nobody outside of her walls seems to know what is actually transpiring within, or what is the real attitude of the Chinese Government toward the powers. In the absence of an open declaration of war the powers have not yet decided that a state of war with China exists. However, this view of the situation is not causing them to spare any pains or to relax any effort to relieve their various citizens whose lives are imperiled by the uprising against foreigners in China. More than 16,000 troops are now ashore at Taku, Tien Tsin has been relieved and another relief column is now approaching Pekin. Li Hung Chang has been prevented from going to Pekin for political reasons, but he still claims to believe that the government at Pekin is not contemplating a war with the world, and he has attempted to defeat the uprising against foreigners in his province by ordering more than 100 of the leaders beheaded. In other parts of China, especially the Shan-Tung province, the Boxer movement is spreading and the lives of missionaries are endangered. Much missionary property has been destroyed and foreigners are fleeing for their lives. The Boxers are said to be approaching Shanghai and are threatening the missions, missionaries and foreigners of that city. Thus far the powers have acted harmoniously in their effort to protect their ministers and missionaries, but how long these friendly relations may be continued is quite problematical. It is to be hoped, however, that nothing will transpire to disrupt this harmony until order has been restored, all lives in jeopardy rescued and satisfactory reparation made by China for all the damages sustained by the interested nations.

The Chinese Minister, Wu, at Washington has sought to persuade the administration not to send American troops to China for the present, but the President has informed him that as long as the lives and property of American citizens are imperiled this government cannot wait on developments, but must take prompt measures to protect its citizens. The public sentiment of the country will sustain the President in this decision. It will be time enough to wait on Chinese diplomacy when the lives of our missionaries, our ministers and other citizens in China are under the protection of the American flag. The appointment of Gen. Adna R. Chaffee to proceed to China to take command of the American forces operating there, and the ordering of additional troops sent there, both from Manila and from this country, is further proof of the determination of the government to afford ample protection to the lives and property of its citizens in China.

On last Saturday afternoon a most disastrous conflagration occurred at the Hoboken Piers, New York, in which three "ocean greyhounds" were totally destroyed, many lives lost and much other property destroyed. At this writing the number of lives lost is supposed to be about 200; but it is feared that the number may be far greater. The loss to property, it is thought, will approximate $20,000,000. The North German Lloyd Steamship Company's loss is said to be $10,000,000. The names of the steamers burned are the Bremen, Main and Saale. These were practically new vessels and among the finest afloat. Besides the burning of these three steamships the North German Lloyd Company sustained a heavy loss in the destruction of its piers at Hoboken.

Another famous steamship, the big Kaiser Wilheim der Grosse, came near being destroyed. She caught on fire but was dragged away by tugs and the fire extinguished after considerable damage had been done. The fire started in some bales of cotton on the wharf and spread so rapidly that the crews and visitors on the vessels named were largely prevented from escaping and are known to be lost. Even those leaping into the river had but little chance of escape. As the Saale was pulled away from its pier by tugs, many persons could be seen at the port holes pleading for help and struggling for their lives until the sinking ship and rising tide brought an end to their misery. It is feared that this holocaust will prove to be one of the worst in the history of New York fires. The steamships Main and Saale had been chartered by the Christian Endeavor Society to carry 300 of its members to London, but it is supposed that none of the Endeavorers were on board, as the vessels were not scheduled to sail until July 3. The Main was burned to the water's edge at its pier. The Bremen was beached on the Jersey flats. The Saale drifted downstream a flaming furnace. None of the vessels were insured. Later estimates do not place the property damages as high as at first thought, but the number of lives lost is still unknown.

The Democrats of Illinois held their convention at Springfield last week, adopted a platform endorsing the Chicago platform "in letter and in spirit," declared against trusts and imperialism, expressed sympathy with the Boers, declared in favor of election of United States senators by direct vote of the people, and nominated a state ticket. The nominee for governor is Samuel Alschuler, of Aurora, a man who has served in the State Legislature, and who has made a reputation for his official integrity and for his uncompromising opposition to all manner of official dishonesty and corruption. The Chicago Herald congratulates the people of Illinois on the fact that this year the two leading parties have two able and honest men as their candidates for governor-Richard Yates and Samuel Alscuhler-and that no matter how the election goes, the state is sure to have an honest and capable administration. This is in gratifying contrast with tickets which have been previously put out by both parties in Illinois, and indicates progress in the right direction. A noteworthy feature of this convention was the selection for delegates at large to the Kansas City Convention of two men who were gold Democrats during the last campaign. Whether this means that these men have modified their views on the monetary question, or whether the Illinois Democracy has taken this opportunity of expressing its dissent to the plan of reaffirming the financial plank of the Chicago platform at Kansas City, we are not able to say.

On the day of our National Independence two political parties, the Democratic and the Silver Republican, will begin the sessions of their national conventions in Kansas City, Mo. The Democratic Convention will hold its sessions in the Convention Hall, just completed, and the Silver Republican Convention will hold its sessions in Auditorium Theatre. Owing to the different method used by each party in the appointment of delegates it is thought that the delegates of the Silver Republican Convention will outnumber those of the Democratic Convention. Of course it is a foregone conclusion that William Jennings Bryan will be the nominee of the two conventions. The only question in the Democratic Convention, at present writing, seems to be whether Bryan should be nominated before or after the adoption of their platform. That the Chicago platform will be reaffirmed in the Democratic Convention is certain, but whether it shall be incorporated word for word or only in a comprehensive way, has not yet been determined. It is now thought that the Silver Republicans will not insist absolutely on the nomination of Mr. Towne as Bryan's running mate, but will insist on a man strictly loyal to the Chicago platform; but who this man will be cannot yet be foretold. Among the names most prominent for second place on the Democratic ticket, at this writing, are those of Mr. Hill, Mr. Sulzer, Mr. Murphy and Mr. Shively, but a stampede of sentiment toward either one of these men has not yet appeared. If Mr. Bryan has any preference in the matter, or any other man in view, he has not yet taken the public into his confidence That trusts, bimetallism and imperialism will be the leading issues of the Democratic platform is now clearly evident, but as to their order, in the matter of their importance, no one seems able to predict. Neither can this be determined wholly by the convention. They will find their relative positions as the campaign develops. It is said that Mr. Bryan will be invited to address the convention. Kansas City is as ready for the two conventions as she can be but the indications now are that she will be overwhelmed with visitors.

On the morning of June 30th, the navy department at Washington, received word that our famous battle-ship, the Oregon, which had been ordered from Manila to Taku had gone on the rocks in the Gulf of Pe-Chi-li, about 150 miles east of Taku and was badly damaged. The rock on which she stranded is known as pinnacle rock. The dispatch states that the rock penetrated the ship's side above double-bottom, and that there were several small holes made in the bottom of the ship. A boat was sent to her relief from Chee-Foo. There was no loss of life and it is thought that there is some chance of saving the ship. The point where the Oregon grounded is fifty miles west northwest of Che-Foo. The officials of the navy hydrographers office say there is a great rise and fall of the tide at this point, about ten feet, and that it is possible that the Oregon may be floated without assistance. But Captain Wilde's statement of the injury sustained is too brief to enable the authorities at Washington to form a definite idea as to the prospects of saving the ship. Much will also depend upon the weather, but unfortunately this is the season of storms in Chinese waters. Should the vessel be lost, the accident will be a matter of great regret to all the people of the United States because of her remarkable history in connection with our late war with Spain. The Oregon is one of our costliest and most heavily armored battleships and the loss of such a vessel at such a time might mean more than the loss of her cost. We have other vessels of her class in our navy and others nearing completion and still others in the course of construction, and yet the loss of such a vessel as the Oregon, tried and true as she was known to be, would be a loss that would be both felt and regretted. It is to be hoped, however, that she can be saved.

THE REGENERATION OF CHINA.

Events in the "Flowery Kingdom" of late have been of transcendent importance. They have attracted the attention of the whole civilized world. While there is a great deal of mystery attaching to certain questions at this writing, such as the fate of the Relief Column under Admiral Seymour, which left Tien Tsin two weeks ago for Pekin, and the fate of the Foreign Legations and missionaries in Pekin, enough is known to indicate that we are perhaps at the beginning of the end of the old order of things in China. It is known that the regular Chinese troops are fighting with the "Boxers" against the allied international forces, and that property has been destroyed and blood has been shed and life taken at Tien Tsin and Taku. There is great fear that worse news will soon come from Pekin. There is little doubt that the Empress Dowager is in sympathy with the "Boxers" in their insane opposition to foreigners and foreign innovations.

At this time the nations of Europe, together with the United States, are hurrying their forces forward to China to protect the lives and property of their citizens who are sojourning in that country as diplomats, missionaries or tradesmen. It is reported that there is an agreement among the different nations now co-operating in China so far as preserving the lives of foreigners, protecting property and restoring order. After that other questions more delicate will be raised, about which there may be difference of opinion, but evidently the first thing to do is that which has been agreed upon.

Our readers who have kept up with the modern history of China will remember that very important reforms were begun a few years ago under the reign of the Emperor, who was favorable to missionaries and to Western ideas and improvements. The Empress Dowager, a very strong but unprincipled woman, who by sheer force of her personality has risen from obscurity to be the ruler of 400,000,000 people, deposed the Emperor, made him a prisoner in the palace and put a stop to all the reforms that had been set in motion. Not only so, but the lives of those men who were active in instituting these reforms were in jeopardy from this bloodthirsty Queen. It was in their behalf that Timothy Richards made his plea before the present outbreak occurred, both at the Ecumenical Conference at New York and later before the State Department at Washington. What he feared is now taking place.

What does it all mean? In our judgment it means that the seeds of revolution are springing up in China. It seems that the old order of things is passing away. Some things have to get worse in order to get better. Chinese civilization as represented by the present ruler is a menace to the world's peace and progress. It has become intolerable. The nations will be compelled either to partition China out among themselves and govern it or else declare a united suzerainty over China, put the Emperor on the throne, depose the Empress Dowager and rule the country in that way until it has reached the position where it can govern itself. At any rate, what is certain is that life and property of foreigners must be made secure in China. This done, the Christian religion, with other cooperative agencies of civilization, will do the rest.

Those who are able to recognize the hand of God in human history will not fail to see the significance of the events now transpiring in China. Those who are dull of vision will not understand their meaning. Some of the daily papers are asking whether it is admissible or right to force a Christian civilization upon China. A recent cartoon in one of the great dailies represents the nations as forcing the Christian religion upon that ancient empire. But this is to misunderstand the whole situation. The Christian religion is not propagated by force, but it is the province of human government to protect life and property and to insure citizens their right of civil and religious liberty. Chinese come to this country, erect their joss houses and carry on their ancestral worship without let or hindrance. Americans and others must enjoy the same rights in China. The civilized nations of the earth will see that they do. It is within their province to enforce this respect for the rights of their citizens anywhere. When this is accomplished, then Christ and Confucius will contend for the mastery in China, and Christ will win.

No nation has a right to fence itself in from the world's light and civilization and become a stench in the nostrils of the world. It must advance with the progress of the race or go down. There is no escape from this law. It was under its operation that the Canaanitish tribes were driven out of Palestine to make way for people which contained the seeds of a higher and truer civilization. We need not be amazed, therefore, at what we see going on in China. God is carrying forward his great purpose in the world. Sometimes the red plowshare of war must break up the soil and prepare it for the seeds of a better civilization. If China will not peacefully yield, as Japan did, to the higher ideals of Christian civilization, upon her must fall the consequences. Jesus Christ must rule over China. His kingdom is to be a universal kingdom. This includes China. The nation that resists light and knowledge brings disaster upon itself. This is what the Chinese Government is doing at present. But God will overrule this for the good even of China. What we see now in China is perhaps the beginning of the political and religious regeneration of that ancient empire.

HIRAM JUBILEE COMMENCE-MENT.

The editor has been on Hiram Hill. It was the occasion of Hiram's Jubilee Commencement. It was a great occasion for Hiram-a Red Letter day in its history. It was good to be there. Hiram's friends, new and old, were there. It was a goodly company of elect men and women. Hiram has completed a half century of history, including the period of the Western Reserve Eclectic Institute, with this commencement. In anticipation of this event, about a year and a half ago President Zollars conceived the idea of a popular endowment of the institution. The plan was to enlist the interest of the brotherhood in college endowment in general and the endowment of Hiram in particular. Our papers were freely used, stereopticon lectures, illustrating Hiram scenery, Hiram men, and public men in general among us, were employed, and President Zollars, aided by two or three others, has given his time largely to the working out of this scheme. His plan was to secure a popular subscription first and then secure some larger donations. Tais reversed the usual method, but it worked, because of the man behind the plan. There were three $25,000 donations, five or six of $10,000, more of $5,000, and so on down the gamut. The total sum up to date announced by President Zollars was $225,000. After this some "back counties" were heard from, which, with a telegram from an old Hiram student, from the Philadelphia convention, pledging $2.500, raised the total to $230,000. The people cheered, and the great audience rose and sung.

"Praise God, from whom all blessiags flow!"

Thursday forenoon was occupied in securing additional subscriptions to the endowment fund, before the foregoing announcement was made. A special effort to raise a $50,000 memorial fund, in memory of Prof. Arthur C. Pierson, who had died a few days ago, and whose vacant chair, draped in mourning, occupied a conspicuous place on the platform, met with good success. It is to be raised by the students and alumni of the college. The strong hold which Hiram College has on the students is seen in the leading part they have taken in its endowment. The afternoon of Thursday was occupied by addresses from the editors of the Christian Standard and the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, by the conferring of degrees on the graduating class, with appropriate addresses by the class professors and President, and a poem by Mrs. Jessie Brown Pounds. The graduating class numbered 48, in all courses, and was a fine-looking body of young ladies and gentlemen. Bro. Lord's address had the double merit of being popular in style and adapted to the occasion; the words of the professors to the graduates were timely and wise; those of President Zollars came out of a great heart of love; the poem of Mrs. Pounds-our poet laureate -was exquisite, touching the heart, quickening memory and brightening hope. The singing by the young ladies' glee club was a delightful feature of the occasion. Evidently Hiram is not neglecting to cultivate the musical talent of its students. It was a great day for Hiram College. But there was another day to follow.

Friday forenoon was devoted to the Western Reserve Eclectic Institute. Prof. Hinsdale read an historical paper on the origin and early history of the institute which later grew into Hiram College. It is hardly necessary to say that this was an able paper. Prof. Hinsdale, now of Michigan University, was a student of the Eclectic Institute, a companion of Garfield, and succeeded him as head of the institution, which he served many years. His memories of the place, and of the men and women who wrought there in the early days, are very vivid, and are deeply engraven on his heart. As he sketched those early days of struggle, and characterized the men and women who are associated with early Hiram life. the Professor's voice often grew husky with emotion and his eyes misty with tears. Those who suppose him incapable of deep and tender emotion do not know him. Among the other speakers whom Prof. Hinsdale, as master of ceremonies, called out were Harrison Jones, Lathrop Cooley, Elder Ross; Judge White, of Cleveland; T. D. Truedsley, superintendent of schools, of Youngstown; J. H. Lockwood, of Cleveland; Bro. Teachout, of Cleveland; Amzi Atwater, of Bloomington, Ind., and others, whose names we do not now recall. Mrs. Hinsdale read a memorial paper. Seldom have we enjoyed an occasion more than this. In that one session we seem to have lived through the entire history of Hiram, and we feel that we have a pretty clear understanding of the Hiram spirit and Hiram men. The widow of A. S. Hayden, the first president of the institution, sat on the platform, a living link connecting the past and the present. How much these fifty years of service have done for the world-who can tell?

In the cool of the morning, our hostess, Mrs. Prof. Wakefield, drove us about Hiram Hill, pointing out the homes of the professors, the Garfield House, Tiffany Hall, and other historic spots, and indicating the splendid panoramic views of farms meadows, forests, valleys, and the distant purple hills, which are visible from Hiram heights. Round about here Mormonism had its origin and early struggles. Within sight are the scenes of the early labors of Sidney Rigdon, Joseph Smith and other Mormon leaders. Here at our feet is Mahoning Valley, and we are reminded of the Baptist Association which adopted the principles of the Reformation. What a restful spot this seems to be! Hiram Hill is crowned with graceful trees-walnut, beech, chestnut, maple and elm-and in the center stands the main college building. which is the old building enlarged and improved, containing the room in which Garfield taught yet intact; and near it, further south, is the new Y. M. C. A. building, a splendid structure with a beautiful college chapel. These, with the large tabernacle and the dormitories, three in number, make up the college buildings. If one wished to retire from the noise and strife of city life, and yet live among cultivated people, Hiram would seem to offer superior attractions. It is more than two miles to the nearest railroad station. The spirit of quiet restfulness is there, and the air from orchard and meadow is pure and bracing. Hiram has a future. Its permanence is assured. With the beginning of its second half century it enters upon a new era.

These lines are hastily jotted down at Macatawa Park, which we have just reached by a night's ride across Lake Erie to Detroit and a day's ride across Michigan, with several hours' lay over at Grand Rapids. This closes up a series of engagements running through several weeks, involving much travel and absence from home. It was quite like coming home to here. Edgewood-on-the-lake was open and ready to receive us, for Mrs. G. had arrived a few days before. The trees on the quiet hills are as green as ever. The wren is singing the same sweet, old notes as it twitters about the cottage. The lake is as blue as in years gone by, and its wavelets to-day make the same restful lullaby to which we have listened and under whose soothing influence we have mused for a decade of summers. There are no "strikes" here except those which fishermen get when casting for black bass. No furnaces belch out black volumes of smoke here to mar the beauty of the scenery or to darken the blue skies. No roar of city traffic drowns the songs of the birds or the whisper of the leaves. Here let us rest a little while and store up vital energy for other tasks. do not know yet who are here, except G. W. Muckley who, with his wife, called at our cottage last night. He has just joined his family here. Also the families of W. F. Richardson and G. H. Combs are here. The Muckley's and Combs occupy the Haley cottage-"Old Kaintuck." Tyler and family will not be here this sum-We called at their beautiful home in Cleveland on our way here from Hiram, and greatly enjoyed a few hours with him and his lovely family. Our readers will be pleased to know that for the past three or four weeks Bro. Tyler has made marked improvement, and they will join us in the prayer that he may be restored to health again. His heart is full of true and tender things he would like to say to his brethren if health permit.

But here we pause. Let correspondents who wish to reach us personally, address us here. All matter for the paper should, of course, be sent directly to the office as heretofore.

hour of Prayer.

OUR BURDEN-BEARER.

(Psalm 55; Matt. 11:28-30.)

[Uniform Midweek Prayer-meeting Topic, July 11.]

CENTRAL TRUTH: God does not desire his children to carry burdens which embitter life, but asks us to cast them upon him—the soul's true rest.

It is proof that the Scriptures are written out of the experiences of human life as well as by the inspiration of the Spirit that they are so well adapted to our human condition. One of the great facts of human experience is that life is full of burdens. These burdens are the result of sin, or of disappointment, or of the falsity of friends, or of the persecution and oppression of our enemies. The ordinary ills of life, such as sickness, bereavement, losses, often constitute burdens which are hard to bear.

It is in recognition of this fact that the Scriptures point out to us the great Burdenbearer, who is both willing and able to carry our burdens for us. In the psalm cited above there are suggested both a false and true method of escaping our burdens. When the psalmist had uttered his complaint before the Lord concerning the oppression of the wicked he exclaimed:

"Oh that I had the wings of a dove! Then would I fly away and be at rest. Lo, then would I wander far off, I would lodge in the wilderness. I would haste me to a shelter From the stormy wind and tempest."

But we do not escape our burdens by flying away into a wilderness. No "wings of a dove" can carry us far enough to escape, completely, the burdens of life. The psalmist himself came to know the truth of this by experience, for he afterwards cried out:

"As for me, I will call on God;
And the Lord shall save me.
Evening and morning and at noonday will I complain and moan;
And he shall hear my voice."

This brings the psalmist to the true and only effective method of escaping from the burdens of life:

"Cast thy burdens on the Lord, and he shall sustain thee;

He shall never suffer the righteous to be moved."

Many another believer since the days of the psalmist has realized the truth of this statement. When all other means of relief from burdens which have seemed intolerable have failed they have cast them upon the Lord and he has sustained them.

In what way may we cast our burden upon the Lord? In the first place, many of those things which constitute a burden disappear when we bring them into the presence of the Lord, even as the specters of the night disappear with the rising of the sun. All imaginary ills and afflictions vanish when we bring them into the light of His presence. All those burdens which come of our pride, our vain ambitions, our inordinate desires, weigh nothing when we put them in the scales of the divine judgment.

But there are burdens that are actually unavoidable-the difficult duties and the inevitable adversities of life. How may we cast these upon the Lord? By seeking strength from Him with which to bear them. By asking for patience with which to endure them. When Paul asked that he might be relieved of a certain affliction, the request was not granted in the way he had expected, but grace was given with which to bear it. And this, he learned, was better for him. What matters it to us whether the burden be taken away or whether we be given strength to bear it? Perhaps the latter is the better for us! Who can say but that this is the very reason why burdens are laid upon us, that we may seek for added strength from God?

How well the New Testament harmonizes with the Old on this subject is seen in the quotation cited above, where Jesus says in words of inimitable tenderness: "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you and learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart; and ye shall find rest unto your souls. For my yoke is easy and my burden is light."

These words appeal to us more strongly than those of the Old Testament because the Word has now become flesh and is dwelling among us, sharing our human experiences, feeling the pressure of our burdens and knowing the bitterness of our sorrow. It is out of these experiences that He utters this invitation which has been a balm to so many burdened and sin-wounded hearts through all the succeeding centuries. It is apparent from these words of Jesus that the great burdens of life are those which weigh on the soul. To all who are sin-sick, weary of sin's wages and longing for rest for their souls He extends His sweet invitation and offers the blessed promise: "I will give you rest."

Is not this what we all desire? Are we not heart-weary with sin and its buffetings? Do we not long for a truer and better life than we have ever lived? Do not our souls long to be bathed "in seas of heavenly rest?" The truth which Christ would teach us is that we are not compelled to wait until another world for that rest, but that we may find it here, even now, by coming to Him and taking His yoke upon us, adopting His plan of life and learning of Him. The yoke is not an instrument of torture, or even a symbol of subjugation. It is a device for enabling oxen to draw their burden more easily. Christ's voke is a means of lightening our burdens by teaching us how to bear them. O, that we might all come to Jesus that He might teach us the secret of peace and happiness! That we might bring all our burdens to Him and learn of Him how to bear them without weariness! Let not this meeting close to-night without a resolve in each heart to learn of Christ the secret of rest and peace.

PRAYER.

O, Thou gracious Lord and Master, who art the world's great Burden-bearer, we thank Thee that Thou didst stoop down from heaven to share our sorrows, our burdens, to teach us how to live that we may enjoy rest unto our souls. We thank Thee that Thou art a refuge from sin and from all the carking cares and bitter burdens of life. May all our hearts respond to Thy gracious invitation and come unto Thee that we may take Thy yoke, learn of Thee and find that rest for which our souls long—rest here and forevermore! For Thy name's sake. Amen!

Editor's Easy Chair or MACATAWA MUSINGS.

It seems good to be back once more on the old sandhills of Macatawa, which Nature's forces have reared here by the lake-shore through the centuries of the past, and crowned with great trees of many varieties. It is good to come back to the many-hued, many-voiced and many-mooded lake Michigan, which, in calm and storm, is a neverfailing object of interest. It is good, too, to look again upon the quiet waters of Macatawa Bay or Black Lake, nestling beside Lake Michigan like a child smiling in the embrace of its mother. We can never look upon this combination of landscape and waterscape, thread the winding paths through forests primeval, which crowd this tongue of land between the lakes, and breathe the invigorating air coming over the water, without feeling that the good God, who has provided so many things for man's welfare and happiness, must have prepared this place as a resting-spot for weary workers, and a refuge from the heat and noise of city life. We prize the place all the more because we accept it as a gift from Him who careth for us, and who has so generously provided for our human wants. But if it be a gift from the hand of God, then it ought to be used to His glory and made to serve His cause and kingdom.

Speaking of the many-voiced Lake Michigan, the gentle jullaby of a few days ago has changed this morning to a resounding anthem. Was it the tumultuous waves beating upon the shore of rocky Patmos that gave to John that splendid phrase-"The voice of many waters?" All night a stiff breeze has prevailed from the south, and this morning the beach is resounding to the white breakers that beat upon its sands. It is this change of mood and music that prevents monotony, and makes the old Lake an object of unceasing interest. Last evening the sun went down between two pillars of clouds which made a great gateway for his departure. Up through this gateway the rays of the descending sun shot clear to the zenith, widening out like an inverted pyramid with its apex on the horizon. The contrast between the golden color of the clouds shot through with the rays of the sun, and the dark somber hue of those outside the path of light, made one of the most striking sunset scenes we have ever witnessed over Lake Michigan. It was as if Nature had planned for the departure of the god of day on a scale of magnificence befitting his dignity and glory.

These paragraphs are penciled in our little study, the latest addition to Edgewoodon-the-Lake. It has stood here on the summit of the hill overlooking Lake Michigan through the stormy wintry months. often covered, no doubt, with snow and ice, still, lonely and untenanted. Our favorite window on the southwest looks out upon a scene very different from that which is presented to our vision from the window at which we sit in our office in St. Louis. That presents to us a scene of bicycles, carriages, automobiles, and, on days of special interest, military and civic parades with floating banners and sounds of martial music; but this window in our Macatawa study gives us a view of Lake Michigan, stretching far away to the western and southwestern horizon, sometimes smiling in placid serenity, and sometimes, as to-day, presenting a scene of tumultuous grandeur, as the "whitemaned coursers of the deep" - to use a Homeric phrase-chase each other shoreward. Sometimes the smoke of a passing steamer, and often in the afternoon and evening, especially on quiet days, the little puffing steam launches, with ever and anon a white sail in the distance, add to the variety and picturesqueness of the scene. The difference to the ear is quite as great as to the eye. It is the difference between noise and music. The roar and din of a great city are trying on the nerves, but there is a restfulness about the music of these waters that seems a very balm for weary and exhausted nerves. There is another difference in which the whole body is interested; it is that of temperature. The atmosphere to-day and habitually is cool, invigorating, a sort of tonic for mind and body. We have known days in St. Louis when it was not so. Even here it gets warm in the sunshine, but a shade and breeze always bring relief.

The population of Macatawa is now rapidly increasing. In addition to those we mentioned last week we have met with Bro. B. A. Jenkins, who, with his family and his mother, is quartered on the lake front in the Bellamy Cottage. Bro. Jenkins has accepted a call to the Richmond Street Church, in Buffalo, N. Y., and begins his work there next Lord's day, but will spend part of his summer here with his family. The Thompsons, Youngs and Mrs. F. E. Udell, of St. Louis, have arrived, also Bro. T. S. Ridge and family and Bro. and Sister W. J. Halleck, of Kansas City. Bro. and Sister Bowman, of Chicago, are occupying the Tyler cottage, "Ole Virginny," and we are expecting Bro. T. P. Haley and wife, of Kan sis City, and Bro. F. G. Tyrrell and family, of Chicago, in a few days. The latter will occupy the cottage erected by the late Bro. Everest. There are many improvements in progress at the Park, especially on individ ual cottages. A new dock at the Macatawa landing is one of the public improvements which is appreciated, and the new sanitary regulations which are being carried out have already removed the only objection that we ever heard urged against the place. Religious services for the season begin next Lord's day at the Auditorium in the afternoon, and on the beach in the evening, as heretofore. Fishing, this season, is reported to be perhaps better than ever before. We have seen some fine strings brought in. The Muckley family passed our cottage a day or two since with a string of ninety perch which they had pulled out in a few hours' fishing in Lake Michigan. Muckley "gets there," whether after fish or church extension funds. Among the catches this year have been several muskalonges. These are all duly reported in the "Macatawa Bay Resorter," a new daily which is published at Holland for the benefit of the resorters, and, incidentally, of course, of the publishers.

It is comforting to know that, despite the disappointment about halls in Kansas City, and the uncertainty growing out of that disappointment as to where the convention would be held, for a good while, there is a wide interest already felt in that coming convention. It is due to the Kansas City people to say that it was through no fault on their part that the Convention Hall, which they had expected to secure, was not secured in time. There was an unfortunate proviso attached to the motion locat. ing the next convention in Kansas City, which related to railroad rates, and before the railroads could be heard from satisfactorily, the owners of the Hall let it to other parties, after waiting a due time for a definite decision from our board. But there are plenty of large churches in Kansas City. One of these will answer for the business sessions, and of evenings and on Lord's day the program will have to be duplicated in different places and the audiences divided. This will have advantages as well as some disadvantages, and we will make the best of it. Get ready for a great convention in Kansas City.

Edgewood-on-the-Lake, Macatawa, Mich.

Rev. W. S. Danley, D. D., in a recent number of the Cumberland Presbyterian, strongly urges the necessity of pressing Christianity into politics. Here are some of his utterances:

When bad men wish to fleece and eat the state as a tender lamb, they become very anxious about the best interests of the church, and urge all men to see that religion is kept out of politics. There are religious duties every good man owes his country, and one is to keep evil men out of office, and to see that only good measures prevail.

We claim that Christianity is the best religion

We claim that Christianity is the best religion extant, but if it cannot be applied to business and politics it is worthless and should be replaced by another more practical religion.

Church and state must not be united, but the church must influence men in their business, and in their social and political life. It is said politics is bad, that it is a dirty pool and church men should not dabble in it. But by politics our country is governed, and therefore good men must purify the pool of politics. Politics must be made good or we are all lost.

ALEXANDER CAMPBELL AND THE OPERATION OF THE HOLY SPIRIT—II.

W. A. OLDHAM.

In my last paper I gave two statements of the proposition debated between Mr. Campbell and Mr. Rice. Here is the first: "In conversion and sanctification the Spirit of God operates only through the Word." To this add the phrase "of truth," and you have the second. The first was the one discussed, the las the one agreed upon. I supposed the one agreed upon was the one discussed, and was reading that when I stated the second. When I stated the first I was reading the proposition as it is given at the beginning of Mr. Campbell's first speech. I did not notice the discrepancy until I saw Bro. Garrison's comment upon the latter "Only through the Word" proposition. means only through the "Oracles of God." commonly known as the Bible. Mr. Campbell's phraseology, means the written Word of God. "Word," "Word of truth," or simply "the truth," are in his usage simply synonymous and identical expressions. This is shown by the substitution of the proposition debated for the one agreed upon without a shadow of protest from Mr. Rice, and by the use of "Word of truth," "the Word" and "truth" indiscriminately. Logical fairness requires but this denial of Bro. Garrison's: "Bro. C seems to have used both phrases, but in deciding on the final form was no doubt influenced by the consideration just stated." That consideration was: "The truth, or the Word of truth, is a much broader phrase than the written Word." While it is true that truth is broader than Word of truth, and the latter than written Word, in Mr. Campbell's usage the phrases were identical in meaning. This I think Bro. G. will admit if he has the debate before him. I shall, however, proceed to show that such is the case, and incidentally to show in a word, or a sentence or two, what Mr. Campbell's position on this important question was.

I think I understand the force of language, and no man used clearer, or was at more pains to be understood on this question, than Mr. Campbell. I will not admit that I am stating only my belief. I state his position in Mr. Campbell's own words. In the Harbinger of 1858, page 233, occurs this language: "The modus operandi of the Holy Spirit upon the human soul is not an item of revelation. We know that he works only through the written or spoken oracles of God. On this platform we have been building for more than five and thirty years." This is Mr. Campbell's own comment on his position, and the meaning of "the Word of truth." I quote from the Harbinger of 1858. page 290: "We believe the Word and the Spirit, and the Spirit and the Word are inseparable in the work of illumination, regeneration, sanctification and the ultimate and eternal salvation of man." This occurs in a denial that he or Dr. Richardson held otherwise. This is Mr. Campbell's position, and I for one most heartily concur. There may be "Word-alone" people, but I have never known one. None of our preachers, so far as known to me, denies that the Spirit is a person, none of them suppose that he is dead, or gone on a journey, or is asleep. Speaking of the power of the Holy Spirit Mr. Campbell uses this language in the debate, page 621: "Unfortunately, however, this power is never displayed to our conviction at the time, nor ever so displayed after the event as to become an object of perception, much less of sensible demonstration." The perception here spoken of is inner perception, as is shown by the phrase "much less of sensible demonstration." But inner perception in the phraseology of the present day is consciousness. In this Bro. Campbell agrees with Dr. Hodge: "The operations of the Spirit do not reveal themselves in the consciousness otherwise than by their effects. We know that men are born of the Spirit, that the Spirit dwells in the people of God and continually influences their thoughts, feelings and actions, but we know this only from the teaching of the Bible, not because we are conscious of his operations." This is a clear statement on the part of Dr. Hodge that the indwelling Spirit is a matter of faith, not a matter of knowledge. We believe the Spirit dwells in us, but we do not know it. I am using belief and knowledge in the strict sense. This also agrees with Mr. Campbell as this quotation shows: "No living man has ever been heard of, and none can now be found, possessed of a single conception of Christianity, or of one spiritual thought, feeling, or emotion where the Bible or some tradition of it has not been before him. Therefore, the Spirit of God, now the SPIRIT of the WORD, is the origin of all spiritual words and conceptions."

Now, however, to the debate proper, to show what Mr. Campbell held: "Did I not distinctly affirm that the Spirit of God operates in conversion and sanctification only through the truth? This I solemnly affirm as my belief. This he denies. He maintains another proposition, viz., that the Spirit of God operates in conversion and sanctification, not only through the truth, but sometimes without it." That truth here is not truth in general the following quotation will show: "The question is, whether God converts men to Christ, or sanctifies Christians, without the truth of the Bible" (pp. 640-1). "All the motives, arguments and persuasions of the Holy Spirit are found in the record. He uses no other in the work of conversion, or in the work of sanctification. 'Sanctify them through thy truth.' 'The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul.' So far as moral influence is concerned there is none besides, none beyond, this" (p. 644). This statement is repeated in the second speech. I quote Mr. Campbell's own comment on the meaning of the proposition: "The proposition before us is: 'In conversion and sanctification the Spirit of God operates only through the Word of truth,' or always through the Word of truth. The proper difference between us is the difference between sometimes and always. Mr. Rice admits it sometimes so operates, but not always; sometimes operating without the Word of truth." Could any language be more explicit? Word and Spirit never separated, Spirit and Word never separated! Bro. Campbell virtually says that the Spirit limits his operations to the Word of truth in conversion and sanctification. Mr. Campbell does not so limit, but the Spirit limits himself, an important distinction, as we all believe in the omnipotence of the Spirit. Moreover, Mr. Rice says that the infidel argues just as Mr. Campbell does, accounting for all religious matters on natural grounds, a reproach brought against the writer on the same grounds in a controversy in the Standard a few years since. Mr. Rice charges Mr. Campbell with limiting the Spirit to the Word. So those of his way of thinking are now charged, but it is not from the Presbyterians that the charge comes. The quotations, in foregoing, italics and capitalizations are in the original.

This passage shows the fact that Mr. Campbell was abreast of this age as well as his own: "His love is poured into our hearts, says Paul, by the Holy Spirit that is given to us.' The old theory is that we cannot love God until the Holy Spirit sheds that love abroad in our hearts, i. e., by direct impact creates that love for God. This is a misinterpretation as Farrar, Alford, Schaff, Tholuc, Meyer and Campbell teach. Campbell was led to the proper interpretation by the inductive method. It is God's love for us, not our love for him which is shed abroad in our hearts. "The love of God is all enveloped in it (the Word), and that is the great secret of its charm-the mystery of its power to save. . . . Now love is a matter of intelligence—a matter that is to be told, heard, believed and received by faith! The power of God to salvation (the gospel) is the persuasive power of infinite and eternal love, and not the compulsive and subduing power of any force superadded to it. The promise of eternal life is itself a power of mighty magnitude. So are all the promises that enter into the Christian hope. These are mighty impulses, when understood and believed, upon the veracity and faithfulness of God." In the light of this ponder this promise: "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." That simple assurance has brought peace to thousands of hearts that had been taught to look for some mysterious illumination rather than to the "Word of truth."

"X. Whatever influence is ascribed to the Word of God in the sacred Scriptures is also ascribed to the Spirit of God. Or in other words, what the Spirit of God is at one time and in one place said to do is at some other time and in some other place ascribed to the Word of God. Hence I argue that they do not operate separately, but in all cases conjointly. We shall give an induction of a number of cases in exemplification of the fact. Are we said to be enlightened by the Spirit of God? We are told in another place: 'The commandment of the Lord is pure, enlightening the eyes!" Again: 'The entrance of thy Word giveth light, and maketh the simple wise.' Are we said to be converted by the Spirit of God? We hear the prophet David say: 'The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul.' Are we said to be sanctified through the Spirit of God? We hear our Lord praying to his Father: 'Sanctify them through thy truth; thy Word is truth.' Are we said to be quickened by the Spirit of God? The same is ascribed to the Word of God. David says: 'Thy Word, O Lord, hath quickened me'-'Stay me with thy precepts, thy statutes quicken me.' This is one of the strongest expressions. . . . Paul in one context says: 'Be filled with the Spirit:' and when again speaking on the same subject, in another, says: 'Let the Word of Christ dwell in you richly.' In both cases the precepts are to be fulfilled in the same way-'teaching and admonishing one another in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, making melody in your hearts to the Lord.' Again, Paul says he has sanctified the church and cleansed it with a bath of water and the Word. In another instance he says he hath saved us 'with the washing of regeneration and the renewal of the Holy Spirit. (Notice carefully.) Are we said to be 'born of the Spirit?" We are also said to be 'born again, or regenerated by the Word of God'" (p. 720-1).

"XI. My eleventh argument is deduced from the important fact that resisting the Word of God and resisting the Spirit of God are shown to be the same thing, by very clear and explicit testimonies," etc., etc. Resisting the Spirit of God is not, then, resisting some impulse supposed to be the direct work of the Spirit.

"It should not, therefore, be thought strange that the Word of God and the Spirit of God are sometimes represented as equi-potent—as equivalent. Indeed, in all those passages that represent the Word of God and the Spirit of God as being the causes of the same effects, this equivalency is clearly implied. Hence, while Peter says: 'By the Word of God the heavens were of old,' Job says: 'By his Spirit has he garnished the heavens.'"

Thus, as the king of day mounts to his throne, dissipates the black battalions of night and scatters the mists of the morning, the epoch-making mind of Alexander Campbell mounted above the mists and fog and darkness which gathered during the great apostasy.

In the Harbinger of 1834 are seven articles from the pen of Bro. Campbell which are full and explicit on this point. I am satisfied that many of our preachers have never seen them. They were written eight years before the editor of the Christian-Evangelist was born, but are rich and full and clear and worthy of reproduction. If the patience of the editor will admit I shall present another paper from them.

OUR COLLEGES-II.

The Birth of the Intellect, and Faith.

N. J. AYLSWORTH.

Some of the best things in the world are dangerous. Fire is dangerous. The rise of the passion of love in the youth is dangerous. It may mean home, which is our earthly type of heaven; but it may mean vice, whose steps lay hold on death. Unrequited love may mean suicide. With the disappointed girl it may mean wasting disease and lingering death.

The rise of the intellect is dangerous. It means reconstruction, and reconstruction may miscarry. We have seen that the child-life hangs on faith. The child's mental furniture has been derived from the unsupported statements of others. He has not asked for more and would not have attended to it if it had been offered.

In anc ent Babylon there were hanging gardens-beautiful flowers and shrubs, the singing of birds, a hanging paradise-all suspended by a cable. The child-life is such a garden. The heart is bowered in love, hopes blossom all around, far aloft shines the sweet Christian heaven; and it all hangs on "mamma said so." It swings secure in every breeze on that cable, a hanging paradise. Beautiful vision! Happy childhood! Thy day can never return. The intellect rises and says: "That cable will not do-I must cut it." "But my heart is in it." Your heart must make shift as it can; the cable must be cut. "But father and mother trusted in it: why cannot I?" Fathers and mothers may be mistaken. Your reasons? "But if I cannot find any and you cut this cable, all will fall down in ruin and I shall be undone." So let it be, then.

Who does not know that this is a perilous hour? How many men now living have not felt the snapping of the strands of that cable with a shudder; but they snapped and paradise fell, or—?

Faust, Goethe's masterpiece, has been regarded as a mirror of our age. Mephistopheles visits Faust and proposes to take him on a pilgrimage of discovery if he will commit himself completely to his guidance. Mephistopheles is a wonder-worker, but cold, unfeeling, unmoral, a "denier" of the heart. It all ends in black sin and piteous tragedy. Mephistopheles is supposed to represent the human intellect; the discoverer, the wonderworker, but cold, unfeeling, unmoral, the denier of the heart, and to him who commits himself solely to its leading, what befalls? A tragedy? Was that Goethe's lesson? So it has been thought. James Russell Lowell says: "Faust gives us the natural history of the human intellect, Mephistopheles being merely the projected impersonation of that skepticism which is the invariable result of a purely intellectual culture." But Mephistopheles is the devil in this tragedy, as Satan is in the Book of Job. Is it true, then, that the birth of the intellect may be the coming of an enemy into life? True or not true, it must come, or we must close our colleges. Faust was studying when this spirit came to him.

Is this reasoning merely academic? Startlingly clear as these things seem to be, are they merely speculative and somehow not true to fact?

I went to college at the age of seventeen. The president and all or nearly all the professors were Christian men. Not one un-Christian or unsettling remark was made by any of them during my entire course. The student body was largely religious and many of them were preparing for the ministry. One of these was my roommate. If there was a skeptic in the entire school I did not know him. We had chapel exercises and were required to attend religious services every Sunday. But when I left college my faith hung in the balances. I had become a Christian in boyhood under the influence of one of the most saintly mothers; but now I was at sea. My faith was like a castle hanging in midair without support; and for two years after leaving college I was a skeptic in mind and a Christian in heart. can never forget those years; the abyss at my feet, the singing of birds aloft dying in the distance. I did not tell my saintly mother, for I knew it would hurt her and she could not help me. I did not tell my father, for I knew that my troubles had never been his. I did not tell my friends, for I knew they would not understand and would unjustly condemn. I was alone-alone with night, alone with my dying faith, which it seemed I must soon lay away with tears forever. O, what a funeral! How many will not reach to me the hand from editorial chairs, from pulpits, and above all from that large number who have stumbled never to rise and say: "You have told my secret?" Without a strong religious nature I should have been lost. I felt into the darkness like one blind. At last I bought books and ate them as John ate the book in his vision. Strand by strand the breach in the cable on which hung my paradise was made good by reason's tough fibre-Heaven came nearer and I was saved.

How did all this happen? Simply through the rise of the intellect. Had I not studied metaphysics and logic and grappled with Sir William Hamilton? In higher mathematics could I not know for myself, even correct a mistake in the text-book or catch a professor tripping? Had I not read some of the masterpieces of the ancient civilizations with their flavor of paganism and dipped into some of the popular works of modern science with their suggestions of the newer skepticism? Had I not begun to feel the fury of thought and the wild daring of discovery for myself? Questions which had come to me in earlier youth, but had been dismissed as beyond my depth, now came to stay and demand answer. The answer was not at hand; and that was skepticism. And all this was at a Christian college, though not one of our own. Why did I not go to the professors with my troubles? Well, I did not; and perhaps your boy may not. There were various reasons. I was very busy and my skepticism was inchoate and indefinite. The seeds of mischief were there, but the crop had not been grown. When I had time I would face these questions and perhaps all would be right. I was preoccupied and not ready to ask those questions that soon grew terrible. That they were terrible was my salvation. As I write another case rises vividly before me. A bright boy—a Christian home—a college of one of the religious peoples—skepticism. Thirty years have passed and he is still a skeptic, though the conditions favorable to conversion have been the best. There are many such cases. There is danger! danger!! danger!!! in the birth of the intellect. If your boy be a dolt he will not have these troubles; but if not, beware!

There is one further thing that must not be overlooked. The higher infidelity of today is inclined to be silent. Agnosticism is not positive, but negative. It does not claim to know that Christianity is not true; it simply does not know that it is. To be an agnostic is to say: "I don't know;" and there are many good reasons why the doubter should not publish his doubts. George goes to college a bright, happy Christian; he comes back silent. You say he is "reserved." He chances to see his sweet sister kneeling, and in serene trust uttering her prayer to heaven; and he turns away with a moistened eye and says to himself: "God forbid that I should ever jostle that!" He goes to church, he is reverent. Is not a man reverent at his mother's grave? He gives, he works for the church, he is one with you, but to some of your remarks he is strangely silent. Is he a hypocrite? He is a mourner. May not a man plant flowers on his mother's grave and be sincere? And may he not be silent to spare innocent faith? May he not spare others the wound that has slain him? There is no more pathetic picture than that of these silent men. Weep, parents, for you have done this thing! From Chri-tian homes they are coming, coming, and marching ten thousand strong-bright youths-into agnosticism. We are educating a generation of agnostics. The laws of the human mind cannot be mocked, and we are putting a scorpion to our breast. The stars fought against Sisera in their courses, and he fell. The laws of God will fight against us if we ignore them. What shall be done? What?

HARVEY W. EVEREST.

J. FRAISE RICHARD.

I have read with peculiar interest the short but just tribute paid by W. G. Waggoner in a recent issue of the .CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST to the late Brother Everest.

It was my pleasure in the winter of 1883 4 to spend some two months at the home of Bro. Everest. It was during the closing year of his presidency of Butler University at Irvington. I had an opportunity to know him quite intimately in his home and literary life. Several things impressed me:

1. His home life was an ideal one. Courtesy and kindness reigned supreme toward all, members of his family or visitors. The proprieties which characterize the Christian gentleman and parent were punctiliously heeded. The religious element was strong. Recognition of an overruling, loving and helpful Father was constant. Reliance upon divine aid in daily work, secular or religious, was cardinal. A supreme faith in the stability of God's government of the universe and in the immutability of his promises as contained in his written word was ever manifest.

2. While a profound teacher, he was likewise teachable. During the time alluded to, his Divine Demonstration was passing through the press. He submitted to me for criticism much of his revised proof material. Most of the suggestions offered were cheerfully accepted. One instance, a case of mere pleasantry, was an exception. In the line of argument he employed the word "drawback." I do not recollect the exact verbiage, but it was something like this: "This concession is a drawback to the force of the argument." I said to him: "Bro. Everest, is not the word 'drawback' too material and commonplace a term to be employed in an argument of such a character?" "What would you suggest in the premises?" was his quick response. To intensify my objection, I intimated that another term, which then had special significance because of its use in dressing circles, would be very appropriate. It was the word "pullback." He laughed heartily, but was not disposed to accept the substi-

At the time referred to President Everest had some difficulty with the members of his senior class. They failed to understand him, and gave some sort of demonstration that wounded his feelings intensely. I observed at the breakfast table for a number days that his eyes were red, indicative of trouble and loss of sleep. Finally he said to me one morning: "Brother Richard, you have probably noticed for some time that I have been suffering mentally and physically. The difficulty originates in the senior class. As I came into chapel some time ago they hissed me. I am at a loss to know what were best to do. It has worried me exceedingly. What would you do in the matter?"

"Brother Everest," said I, "it is possible that it is too late now to reach the real difficulty in the matter; and if the true remedy were suggested, I fear you would hardly be disposed to adopt it."

His reply indicated great surprise that any one would think for a moment that he would not accept a suggestion that would essist in solving the difficulty. In response I suggested: "First, Brother Everest, you are a grand man, kind, sympathetic, watchful, intelligent and devoted to the best interests of your students. You are misunderstood and misjudged by them. Their conduct originated in this misunderstanding and not from any desire to wound your feelings intentionally. It is a protest against that theory of school management which fixes an impassable gulf between the teacher and the taught, the governor and the governed. The difficulty is a necessary outgrowth of human nature which has been touched by the principles of true republicanism. It exists everywhere."

"But what is the remedy?" he inquired.
"The remedy," suggested I, "is a destruction of this gulf. Mingle with your students freely outside of classes and chapel exercises and let them realize that you are one of their number in the occupations and sports of student life. When class time or chapel exercises arrive, let it be understood then that the relationship is changed and that you are presiding officer and they are members of the audience. If you will do this as General Garfield did in both his school and army work, you will encounter no difficulty in the matter of wise and efficient government."

3. Though intensely sober, he had a reserve fund of humor in his make up. On several occasions at the tea table he referred to the royalty to be received on his book. Said he: "Now if one million copies of this book are sold, my royalty at nine cents a copy will amount to $90,000." Of course, this was his humorous way of putting the matter. It would be a blessing to the world as well as to the author and publishers if one million copies were sold.

Bro. Everest was a close student, an omnivorous reader. He violated, it must be confessed, some fundamental health principles. He failed to realize the recuperative value of rest after the eating of a hearty meal. In consequence his health was not up to the standard, and he departed this world too soon for its good.

AFTER THIRTY-THREE YEARS.

JOSIE GALLEY BROWN.

Rummaging among some old papers a few days ago, I came across a manuscript on gilt-edge note paper, in a chirography so minute as to be read only with difficulty and marked "Valedictory, Pleasant Hill Seminary, June 27, 1867." I opened it and began reading: "Kind Friends, another year has cycled round since we last met you here. It has brought many changes to you, to us, to all." What a flood of memories poured in upon me at the sight of the old, daintily written address, with its prim penmanship and its "Young-Ladies'-Seminary" style of diction. Its "dearest classmates," "dear and honored teachers," "ties that time cannot sever," "pathways that may never cross in this life, but which will lead us all to the same haven at last," "days in the far distant future when we shall live over again in imagination all these scenes," "the last time we shall meet in these halls," and finally ending up with "a last, sad farewell."

How vividly the whole scene comes back to me—the crowded chapel, the faces of visiting parents and friends, wingling with the familiar faces of the village and farm people who have come to witness the one important event of the year for the community. The "Bethany boys," at once our admiration, our bane and our dread, the long stage with the seniors grouped at one end and the whole bevy of juniors and freshmen at the other, the little jealousies about front seats, covertly alluded to by Prof. McKeever in his inimitable sarcasm:

"Be sure to let all the pretty girls sit in the front row." There come back to me the forms of the dear girls clad in their airy, dainty, white dresses, the flutter of fans and ribbons and laces, the hum of voices and the sea of faces at which we dared take only frightened glances. Of the senior class the paper says: "One is from the broad prairies of the West, some from the crowded city, others from the green hills of of a country home, and one is from the distant, sunny South." Can it be possible that I cannot recall the names of them all? Let me try. There was Mary Netterville, of Mississippi. As I recall her, a girl of strong character, a good student with sound judgment, adapting herself to life in the North at a period near the close of the Civil War, arousing no antagonism, though true to her Southern instincts and convictions; Joe Kellar, of Maryland, more hot-headed as to politics, and yet a friend of all; Ida Flanner, the aristocrat of the class because she lived in the city (this was our estimate, not hers); Flora Murphy, of Illinois, who wore curls and got her lessons; Ora Burkett, whom I loved best of all, dignified, stately, ladylike and sweet-spirited. Dear girl, she is the only one of the class whom I have met since that June, and then only for a brief hour. There were Maggie Everett, Sadie Belton and Lettie Linton. There were twelve or thirteen of us, but these are all the names I can now recall.

There were tears of real schoolgirl sorrow that day. The two or three years at the seminary had been to some of us a very important period in our lives. Our degree stood to us for a deal of both work and money. This was the first commencement since the death of our beloved professor, T. C. McKeever, and every reference to him brought a flood of tears. His widow and children and his father and mother were present and came in for a share of our sympathy. I think, on the whole, it was a rather doleful day.

Among those with whom I roomed at difrerent times were Lizzie Guttery Galley, Lottie Streator (both long ago dead), Josie Parker, Franc Preston, Cassie Stevens, Lide Layton, the last from Canada. What fun we had quarreling over our respective states and countries. I recall a remark something like this: "If you don't like the United States and the Yankees, you can just go back where you came from. We didn't ask you to come over here!" New York, Michigan and Pennsylvania had their tilts, about names principally. I remember arguing long and ardently over the respective merits of the names "spider" and "skillet" as applied to a certain cooking utensil, and of the heat with which Pennsylvania resented the laughter of Michigan when the former had called a bag a "poke.'

I wonder how many of the girls live to recall the pranks we played. I have a very vivid recollection of a journey across the fields one rainy evening, shortly before commencement, in quest of a square meal at a little country house, probably a half mile away. How we slipped out of our rooms, after the monitor had made her rounds about dusk, and took our way across the pasture field, not thinking of the cross bull until we were more than half way to the farther side and it was better policy to go on than to turn back; of the swamp we waded rather than take to the public road where we feared the farm negroes more than the horned creatures of the field; of our dismay when the farmer's wife refused to get supper for us on the plea that she had nothing in the house which would be acceptable to us; how the bacon and sour bread which she finally produced were hurriedly swallowed as we saw the darkness growing deeper and the rain pouring still faster, while visions of the fearsome things which might happen on our way home took away all the bravery with which we started out to "do something to remember." I see the trail of wetness we left on the stairs as we stole in at the awful hour of nine oclock, soaked to the skin with the rain overhead and the tall meadow grass which reached to our waists. What wonder Michigan was sick all night and the rest of us "scared to death" for fear we should be held accountable for her death. There are recollections of sundry suppers at late hours, concocted of all things surreptitiously obtained from the table by concerted action or begged from the darkies. Once it was float flavored with too much lemon and eaten out of the washbowl. Float has never tasted good since to some of us.

The fat hen, which was drawn up by a string at the back window made a royal meal. The girls who wrung her neck are both long dead while she who cooked her lives to tell the tale.

The Bethany girls-where are they? Fannie Richardson, Bessie Campbell, Lulu Loos, Madcap Polly Allen and her sister Nettie, the Welch girls from Michigan, Maggie Oliver, Maggie Everett, Sadie Daugherty, Lillie Mendal, Josie Welles, Nin Hoblitzell, Cinnie Smith, the Brenneman girls, the Bastian girls, Lizzie Perrin, Miss McKee, Franc Cool and a hunered others.

Of the teachers who were connected with the school from 1864 to 1867, the principal was A. C. McKeever, who died after a short illness during the summer of 1866. The news of his death came as a great shock to the friends of the school. We who were about to return to complete our studies were fearful that his death would be the death of the school, and so it proved in the end, though its doors were kept open for some years with varying success. Then there were Miss Kate McVey, Miss Alice McVey, Miss Marlatt, Miss Ella Bell, and the music teachers, Prof. Bigger, and Miss Alleman; while Miss Elizabeth MacFadden had charge of the painting class. Prof. Bigger was almost totally blind, yet he knew every pupil as readily as though possessed of all his senses. I tested the accuracy of his memory of voices on meeting him after a period of seven years by simply pronouncing his name, when he sprang to his feet and called me by name without a moment's hesitation.

No doubt many of both teachers and pupils still live who were connected with this, the first school for young ladies founded by the Disciples of Christ. It was founded by Jane McKeever, a sister of Alexander Campbell. Following the example of the founder of Bethany College she located it in a rural district twelve miles west of Washington, Pa., and one mile from the hamlet of West Middleton. How long it was under her management I do not know, but at the time of which I write it had passed into the control of her son. After his death she had nominal control for a year or two, when it passed into other hands and finally into oblivion.

Missouri Bible-school Notes.

Starr, Clark County, where W. H. Hobbs is doing such good work, and where the Bible school has been revived, sends us an offering that more than meets their apportionment for the year ending May 31st, 1900, this being the first offering to this great work, and for which I thank my Bro. Carrick. The church is now in the school and it may be that by faithful teaching they be gladdened by seeing the school in the church.

Good work is being done at Berea, Shelby, the Bible-school continuing "evergreen" for the first time in its history, while the superintendent, W. L. Peoples, hopes to see it continue so for all time to come, and that is just what should be. A. B. Elliott is laboring for the brethren and has always been a Bible-school man, and none rejoiced work. This is the home of the friends to our work. This is the home of the father of our worthy Marion County superintendent, B. F. Glahn, and among the first to our help was Chris Glahn and "Big" Billy Peoples, and A. B. Ray, with others quick to follow. This is another school making its first offering to our work so school making its first offering to our work, so that the new year opens up very encouragingly indeed. This school was to observe Children's Day for the first time also, hence their growing Day for the lifst time also, hence their growing in grace and good works, all of which gladdens the minister of God and the people.

The Fifth, St. Louis, will introduce the Home Department this summer or early fall, and whatever W. F. Hamann takes in hand goes at the Fifth, so the work will be a success and you will hear from it later.

At the California convention Lexington made its usual pledge of $40, paying the first quarter then and there, and Miss Mattie Bandon says it is the way it is to be done the entire year, and if you feel like imitating such workers, with E. J. Fenstenmacher in the lead, you can join any day.

J. H. Wood in his quiet way does much for the Christ in Shelby County this year, preaching every Sunday afternoon, while seeing to it that every one of his schools gives to our work, and you are not surprised to hear that the work grows right Of course, it's do-nothings that die and along.

R. B. Havener, Windsor, takes the Southwest district, while John Giddens, Richland, takes the South Central, and M. H. Wood will move into the Southeast, so that our year begins with good men in each of the southern di tricts, and we hope to do for them this year as last. M. H. Wood is anxious to see the new house at Ava, county seat of Douglas, well under way, then he will try in his earnest way to take Southeast Missouri with the army of faithful men in that region.

Now comes James A. Gordon and Marshall deermined to introduce the Home Department, and hope to introduce the same in the homes of all their pupils and in the homes of many having no pupils in the school, and if this is the go that I sure it will be under such as the superintendent and B. T. Wharton we will have a report for you at the Sedalia convention that will do your hearts good. See?

Auxvasse does best of all, pledging $10, just double last year, and paying in full at the time. Who will happify all by doing the same, or next best, by paying up the quarters promptly, beginning with July.

Commercial Bldg., St. Louis.

Our Budget.

- -The spirit of independence is deepening.
- -Christianity and patriotism are congenial spirits.
- -The doctrine of the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man is but dimly seen as yet.
- -People talk much about God's great love for the world, but like Peter, it is hard for them to realize that that love includes all men.
- —Up to the present the weather has been very comfortable, but the last few days have been uncomfortably warm. We trust that they are not indicative of a long, hot summer.
- —Dr. W. T. Moore, of Columbia, will attend the Chautauqua at White Cloud, Kan., and deliver six lectures and preach two sermons. He will be there from July 6th to the 16th, after which he will spend a season at Macatawa, Mich.
- —Until July 23—and this time limit is absolute—we will send the cloth-bound edition of "On the Rock," by D. R. Dungan, for 75 cents. This edition is handsomely bound and printed and contains 358 pages. It has always sold for $1.50, but for this limited time we will send it postpaid for only seventy-five cents.
- —We regret to have been led into making an announcement concering an alleged bequest of $500,000 to Drake University by the unauthorized statement of a Des Moines paper. The matter was corrected by Gen. Drake at the time, but the correction did not reach us until after we had made the announcement last week. Mr. Drake has probably remembered the institution in his will, but the amount of the bequest was purely a matter of speculation with the paper.
- —Prof. C. W. Robbins has been at the head of Central Business College, Sedalia, Mo., for more than eighteen years. It is one of the most thorough and successful business colleges in the West and natriculates annually over 400 students. Prof. Robbins has prepared and published what he calls the Rapid Calculator. This is a nicely bound book of 284 pages and is a manual in its helpfulness to the business man. Every short method in figures is presented, and at least twice as much work can be done in business calculations by those who understand these methods as without them.
- —In all the literature of the Disciples of Christ no book has had a wider reading than Dungan's "On the Rock." Nevertheless, there are doubtless thousands of Disciples who do not possess the book. Until July 23 we will send the cloth-bound edition, which regularly sells for $1.50, on receipt of 75 cents.
- -The excursion down the river to Montes and given on last Thursday in the interest of the Orphans' Home was a fine success. The day was ideal, the crowd large-over 2,000-the boat ride delightful and the people sociable. Among the amusements provided were "A Trip to Paris." Chalk Talks and Landscape Painting, and some enjoyable vocal and instrumental band music. The chalk talk or free-hand character sketches by Rev. M. L. Sornborger, of this city, were particularly fine. Bro. S. is the brother whom we mentioned last week as having recently come to us from the U B. Church. We are sure that any church would not only enjoy one of Bro. S.'s Chalk Talk lectures, but be profited by it. His address is 1007 Chestnut St. The day passed off pleasantly; nothing happened to mar the pleasure of the crowd. We do not yet know the profits, but they will evidently be large. The commingling of the brethren from all of our churches was one of the fine features of the trip.

- -"On the Rock," cloth-bound, (regular $1.50 edition) for 75 cents. See offer on page 2.
- —M. McFarland, pastor of the church in Columbus, Kan., says that they have raised the money and purchased a parsonage, eight rooms, with four lots, and that he is now installed in the new preacher's home. They have also taken collections as follows: India Relief Fund, $22.50; Children's Day, $25. Also an offering for Home Missions
- —The editorial this week on the Hiram Jubilee Commencement was sent for the Easy Chair department of our last issue, but did not reach us until we had gone to press. The editor says he started it in time to have reached this office in time to appear, but for some to us unknown cause it was delayed somewhere en route.
- —The church at Lyons, Miss., was greatly damaged by a storm this summer and they ask help to have it repaired. They expect H. H. Utterback to hold a meeting for them as soon as the house is put in shape. Any assistance sent to these brethren should be sent to Nancy T. Howard.
- —The indifference of the people toward the rights of the public has been an open door for corruption in politics and wrongs in the industrial world, and until this indifference has changed to watchfulness many of the conditions of which we complain will remain. The rights of the public are as sacred as the rights of an individual and ought to be as sacredly conserved and protected in the laws of the land. This indifference toward public rights has led the assistant editor of this paper to prepare a small treatise on that subject entitled "Public and Private Rights," of which see advertisement in another part of this paper. The book is expected to be ready for mailing by the last of the present week.
- -Chautauqua, New York, will be more attractive than ever this summer. Not only have improvements been made, but not in its unique history have more and better intellectual attractions been offered to its guests. During the past twenty-five years over 260,000 students and 50,-000 graduates have taken advantage of the Chautauqua reading courses and the area of its influence now embraces every state and territory in the Union. More than 60 Chautauqua assemblies are now held in 31 different states with an aggregate annual attendance of more than a half million people. This year the assembly expects a season of unequaled interest, attendance and profit, as its program embraces a rare selection of talent in its various summer departments.
- -On the 19th day of May the governor of Missouri issued a proclamation calling upon the people of Missouri to contribute liberally for the relief of the famine sufferers in India, and a number of St. Louis preachers have since endorsed the proclamation and are giving personal attention to the matter. Missouri is a great and rich state and ought not be behind her sister states in this work of relief and of humanity. It is said that one dollar will save one person's life until the crop comes in October, and at this rate Missouri can save a great many lives. This state has already sent one ship load of 5,000 tons burden and is now making ready another. Should any prefer sending through this commission, of which Rev. William J. Pyle, 6501 Marquette Ave., this city, is secretary, the way is open. Or money may be sent direct to A. McLean or F. M. Rains, Cincinnati, Ohio. The money sent to our foreign board will be distributed to the famine sufferers through our missionaries in India. But money or goods sent through this commission should be sent to Geo. A. Baker, president Continental National Bank, St. Louis, Mo., which will be faithfully forwarded and distributed.

"Durability is Better Than Show."

The wealth of the multi-millionaires is not equal to good health. Riches without health are a curse, and yet the rich, the middle classes and the poor alike have, in Hood's Sarsaparilla, a valuable assistant in getting and maintaining perfect health.

—The seventh annual reunion of the churches of Christ of the counties of Henderson, Hancock, Warren and McDonough was held at the Old Bedford Church, near Blandinsville, Thursday, June 28. Bro. D. E. Hughes, of Monmouth, delivered an address at 11 A. M., and Bro. Buckner, of Macomb, and Bro. Burton, of La Harpe, delivered addresses in the afternoon. Also short speeches by many. L. F. Davis is now the pastor of this historic congregation.

—H. C. Clark reports the work in Kingman Kan., in a flourishing condition. School raised $16 for Foreign Missions. Two boys pulled weeds at 15 cents per day to earn a doller each to get the silver jubilee button. The pastor of the church, S. S. McGill, is highly commended for his wise sermons and Christian life. He preached the memorial sermon to the great delight of the Kingman citizens. The Endeavor Society of the church is doing well. This church has sent out three men to preach Christ. Their names are J. Lockhart, E. M. Haile and H. C. Clark. We are glad to hear of such active fruit-bearing churches.

—James N. Crutcher, pastor of the church in Paris, Tex., of our new book on Christian Science says:

"Christian Science Dissected" tou hes the spot. It is a vigorous, heroic dose, but then an emergency existing creates the necessity for such treatment of this species of delirium.

—Dr. B. B. Tyler is now in Worcester, Mass. This will be his address until July 23rd. Concerning his visit in New England he says:

My work among our little churches in New England is most delightful. I have visited Springfield, Everett, Boston and Brockton, in Massachusetts. Small congregations in each of these places—but good. Have visited the church in Danbury. It is one of the best and strongest congregations in the brotherhood. New England is a good field. It is worthy of the serious attention of the Disciples of Christ.

—In speaking of the street car strike and riots in this city the New York Observer concludes a short editorial on the subject with the following sensible bit of advice to all employers and employees:

Now that peace has been measurably secured it will be well for both employers and employed to consider how such outbreaks may be prevented in the future, and to that end to study the method of settling disputes by conciliation and arbitration adopted by nearly all the trades in Great Britain. All the testimony goes to show that the system is satisfactory to both wage-earners and employers and has served to greatly diminish strikes, and there is no reason to doubt that its application here would have the same beneficent result.

We are surprised that such a reasonable measure for the settlement of industrial troubles does not meet with greater favor in America. If men will not adopt such remedies of their own accord, then the laws of the land should see that they do. It is not right to jeopardize the interests of an entire city to gratify the stubbornness of men on either side of controversies of this character.

—The receipts for the foreign work for the week ending June 28 were $6,787.89. Gain over that of last year, $318.57.

—In announcing the resignation of J. H. Crutcher, of Troy, Mo., last week, by some accident we got it Paris, Mo. We regret the mistake, but hope that no harm has been done. Bro. Briney, of Paris, has no idea of resigning. It is Bro. J. H. Crutcher, of Troy, who has resigned and the church at that point desires correspondence with a suitable man for that field; address J. H. Henry, Troy, Mo.

—While the Fourth of July is usually made a gala day, and should be, it is also a day for reflection, meditation and moral conclusions. No matter what progress we have made, remember that we are not perfect, not out of danger. There are many dangers, but none greater than those that come of sudden wealth, of great riches, of material prosperity. There is danger of the god of this world blinding our eyes to the encroachments of sin. As we enter upon the new century "man, not money; character, not the dollar; liberty, not oppression," should more and more characterize our civilization. Unless we keep these things to the front as a nation we shall lose our independence and finally our existence.

-Entering as we are upon another presidential campaign there are many reasons why during such a season that larger measures of the Holy Spirit are needed. Men differ on their ideas of government and without proper caution and selfcontrol these differences may easily become animosities. This is wrong; men may differ honestly in politics as well as in religion. The things to guard against at such a time are (1) the danger of hard feelings toward a fellowman; (2) the danger of the partisan spirit; the people of one party are as anxious for good government and good times as those of another; (3) the danger of party blindness. Beware of party politicians. Try to look at issues from the moral standpoint. Try to see men as God sees them. Try to talk and vote as Jesus would have you talk and vote. And above all things inform yourselt on the issues of the times.

—Alexander Campbell Hopkins died at his home in Parkland, Louisville, Ky., Sunday, June 10, 1900, at 10:40 P. M. He was 56 years of age and leaves a mother, a wife and four children. Bro. Hopkins was recently professor of Mathematics in Christian University at Canton, Mo. Later he was engaged in Sunday School Chautauqua work. He was a noted [singer and composer and his death comes as a great loss to the Christian Church.

—A very unique and quiet affair took place in the Hyde Park Church of Christ, Chicago, Thursday evening, June 28, at eight o'clock, in the marriage of Dr. Hiram Van Kirk to Miss Augusta Smalstig. The only witnesses of the union were Mrs. Smalstig, mother of the bride, Dr. E. S. Ames, of Butler College, and Mr. Henry Lloyd, of Chicago. The ceremony was performed by Errett Gates, pastor of the Hyde Park Church. The couple went immediately from the church to the depot, where they took a train for Philadelphia. Mr. Van Kirk will supply the pulpit of the Central Church there for a few weeks and then will go to Berkeley, Cal., where he will take charge of the Berkeley Bible Seminary, of which he has been elected dean.

A Mother's True Friend

"I would like to express my gratitude for the benefit received from your wonderful medicine, 'Favorite Prescription,' "wittes Mrs. H. C. Anderson, of South Britain, New Haven Co., Conn., (Box 33). "During the first month of pregnancy I could not keep anything on my stomach. Was so sick that I had to go to bed and stay for weeks. I tried different doctors, but with little benefit. I read about many being helped by using your medicine so I thought I would give it a trial. I began to take your 'Favorite Prescription' in November and I had a nice little baby girl in February following. My baby weighed over eight pounds. I was only in hard labor about one hour and got along nicely during confinement; was up and dressed on the eighth day. I never had the doctor with me at all. My friends thought that I was sick a very short time. I think Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is indeed a mother's true friend, for it helped me wonderfully."

Churches of Kansas-Heed!

It is but a few weeks till the Kansas hosts gather at Ottawa in annual convention. What report will our state workers bring us? Doubtless it will be the story of faithful service on their part, but what will it show for the churches? Will the work done be paid for or will there be a deficit to report?

The answers to these questions is in our hands. The state boards and their representatives are our servants doing for us the work Christ has committed to our care. Surely, we ought to provide necessary means.

If you have not paid your apportionments to state work, fail not to do so before August 1st, that when we meet at Ottawa there may be no debt to mar the rejoicing of that occasion.

Marshall O. Waggoner.

The picture on our first page this week is that of a man who was converted from infidelity to a living faith in Christ and in whose conversion the gramiphone is said to have been partly instrumental. The name of the man is Marshall O. Waggoner, of Toledo, Ohio.

"Mr. Waggoner was born at Norwalk, Ohio, October 8, 1826. On his mother's and grandmother's side he is of the family of Bigelows who settled early in New England and so a relative of the great divine—Russell Bigelow. Mr. Waggoner was, from early life a constant reader, and soon turned from the faith of his ancestors and became an unequivocal materialistic infidel. He especially read everything within his reach upon the question of a future life, both for and against the Christian faith. He succeeded in largely obliterating the impressions, and wholly the faith, of his devout grandmother from his own mind and heart. For many years he has been known widely as a gifted lawyer in Toledo, Ohio, and a writer of vigor and boldness for the different and leading free-thought and infidel periodicals of our country. Through wide research and extensive acquaintance both in this country and in Europe he amassed power with which to combat Christianity."

The death of his wife in April, 1898, however, seems to have marked the beginning of a new life in Mr. Waggoner's career. Serious reflections, prayer, religious hymns, Bible reading, communion with God and conversion followed, so that to-day he rejoices with others in the hope of immortality in Christ. So radical was his conversion that he destroyed his infidel library by fire on the night of November 19, 1898, in the furnace of the Memorial United Brethren Church, of Toledo, of which he had become a member. Mr. Waggoner is a reader of the CHBISTIAN-EVANGELIST and has expressed a very high appreciation of our plea and our people, and it is by his consent that we have his picture for our readers. The news of his conversion was loud y heralded throughout the United States in the secular papers because of his infidel views and especially because of the fact that he used a gramiphone on the night of his conversion in reproducing certain hymns and Scriptures. Mr. Waggoner is a man of vigorous intellect and capable of doing much for the cause he once sought to destroy.

National Conventions, Kansas City.

ANNOUNCEMEMENTS.

Plice and time. The National Missionary Conventions will be held with the churches at Kansas City, October 12th to 18th, 1900.

Railroad Rates. After much correspondence with the railroads, rates have finally been secured for our convention at Kansas City as follows: The rate will be one fare plus $2.00 from the Central and Western Associations for the round trip. In the Western Association, any distance less than 200 miles, the rate is one and one-third fares for the round trip on the certificate plan. Application has been made to the Eastern and Southern Associations for reduced rates.

Entertainment. The entertainment of the delegates of the convention will be as at the Jubilee Convention at Cincinnati. The brethren at Kansas City will secure homes among the people for the delegates at as low rates as possible, and the delegates are to pay for their own entertainment. Special rates will be secured if possible at the various hotels. At a later date the Kansas City committee will ask for the names of all those who expect to attend the convention in order that they may provide for their entertainment.

Programs. The programs are in course of preparation. They will be strong, helpful and attractive in every way. Not being able to secure the great convention hall in Kansas City it will be necessary for the convention to meet in sections. The programs will be arranged accordingly

It is expected that there will be a great gathering of the brethren at Kansas City. The Kansas City churches are going to do everything in their power to entertain the convention and to insure its success. We hope that every one will begin now to plan to attend the great convention of 1900 at Kansas City in October next.

What History Will Record.

History will record that the General Conference of the M. E. Church, which met at Chicago in May of the year 1900, A. D., for deliberation on the affairs of the church, turned out to be chiefly a trial of Wm. McKinley for immoral conduct in permitting the extention of the liquor power and for nullification of the law of Congress against the saloon in the army.

His acquittal is more damaging than his escape by the skin of his teeth when the circumstances are taken into account.

It is like the trial of a minister for immorality. It is hard to tell which will hurt him most, conviction or acquittal.

The position of the men who try the case is the important fact. Lincoln's story of the hog-thief who was tried by a jury, every one of whom had helped to eat the stolen hogs, comes to mind.

THE RELIGION OF LORD ROBERTS.

It would not be right, as the American people are generously interested in all that concerns the the Mother Country, to pass by the wonderful causes of the prosperity and popularity of Lord Roberts. This idol-hero of the nation is a profoundly religious man. He is characterized by the humble and childlike spirit which distinguished Hedley Vicars, Havelock and Gordon. Lord Roberts comes home to England from the war he will, of course, as soon as possible, go to his beloved retreat in Ireland. Like French, Clery and several others of the ablest generals at the front, he is an Irishman. But he will at times be dwelling in London, and then he will on Sundays invariably repair for worship to a very humble little sanctuary altogether unknown to most people and attended by a mere handful of good people. I refer to Gower Street Chapel. This is a little place belonging to the denomination called Strict Baptists, with whom by choice and conviction Lord Roberts casts in his lot. He is not a man of mere fashion, caring for public opinion, but is altogether an independent individualist. I am at present spending a little time daily in reading his great book, in two volumes, published by him four years ago, entitled "Forty-one Years in India." This remarkable military autobiography is much more fascinating than either fiction or fairs tale. It tells the story of the appalling Indian Mutiny as it never was to'd before; and it takes us through the Afghan War under the guidance of an eyewitness and a genius. But what is most delightful is the revelation given of the character of the greatest soldier of the age.

OUR HUMAN HERO.

I will quote at length a page from this work in which Lord Roberts displays his own human disposition and shows that the man, who has never known anything but victory wherever he has met an enemy, is no monster of blood and iron. Some people who are Carlylean worshipers of ruthless force adulate an ideal mixture of Cromwell and Bismarck. "Bobs" is not that half savage, half religious type, nor has he any affinity with the pious but cruel and Canaanitish Krugerism which has made the name of Dutchman or Boer smack of the inferno in the nostrils of all the Bantu blacks of South Africa. Lord Roberts was born in India. He was the son of General Sir Abraham Roberts, a grand old leader who was in active service in India till he was considerably past 70 years of age. Coming to England as a lad for his education, young Roberts returned to the East as a youth to enter the Indian Army. Soon after he landed the mutiny broke out and he plunged into stirring adventures as a young officer. Here is what he says about one of the early episodes of his experience: "One very painful circumstance stamped itself upon my memory. I was obliged to be present at a flogging parade. It was the only one, I am glad to say, I have ever had to attend, although the barbarous and degrading custom of flogging was not done away till about thirty years later. A few years before I joined the service, the number of lashes which might be given was limited to fifty, but even then, under this restriction, the sight was a horrible one to witness. The parade to which I refer was ordered for the punishment of two men who had been sentenced to fifty lashe, each for selling their kits, and to a certain term of imprisonment in addition. They were fine, handsom, young artillerymen and it was hateful to see them thus treated, for it was productive of harm rather than good, for it tended to destroy the men's self-respect, and to make them completely reckless. In this instance, no sooner had the two men been released from prison than they committed the same offence again. They were a second time tried by courtmartial and sentenced as before. How I longed to have the power to remit the fifty lashes, for I felt that selling their kits on this occasion was their way of showing their resentment of the ignominious treatment they had received, and of proving that flogging was powerless to prevent their repeating the offence. A parade was ordered as on the previous occasion. One man was stripped to the waist and tied to the wheel of a gun. The finding and sentence of the courtmartial were read out-a trumpeter standing ready the while to inflict the punishment-when the commanding officer, Major Robert Waller, instead of ordering him to begin, to the intense relief of I believe every officer present, addressed the prisoners, telling them of his distress at finding two soldiers belonging to his troop trought up for corporal punishment twice in a little more than six weeks, and adding that, however little they deserved such leniency, if they would promise not to commit the same offence again and to behave better for the future, he would remit the flogging part of the sentence. If the prisoners were not happy I was; but the elemency was evidently appreciated by them, for they promised and kept their word. I did not lose sight of these two men for some years and was always glad to learn that their conduct was uniformly satisfactory and that they had been good, steady soldiers. Many a preacher might use this incident as illustrative of the power of forgiveness when punishment would avail nothing, but would simply harden the heart of the sinner.

RELIGION IN SCOTLAND.

After the great May meetings in London come some great June assemblies in Scotland. Christianity is still the dominant force in the north of Britain. Bonnie Scotland is to-day the strongest citadel in the world of the Protestant faith, as it has been ever since the Reformation. But there is this drawback even there to Christian progress, that sectism is a religious fetish, and the average Scot is read; to die for his own denomination and to draw the theological sword and cut off at any instant the ears of whole regiments of heretical Malchuses, the abhorred heretics being simply all the human race opposed to his own sacred shibboleth. The sturdy Scottish temperament is at once a glory and a trouble to the nation. It renders the people invincible, but it also stagnates sentiment and crystallizes opinion into implacable bigotry. If the American Board could help us to plant a mission in Scotland it would be difficult at first to make headway, on account of the stubbornness of the Scotch type of Presbyterianism; but when once rooted it would stand with adamantine strength and would tecome a magnificent development. There are signs of giving way on the part of the old sects in the north. The yearning for unity has now inspired the hearts of multitudes of members of two great Scotch communions to seek for some mode of amalgamation. The Free Church and the United Presbyterians are inclining to a corporate and organic union of their forces, and each body has in its synod voted in favor of the proposed coalition. The majorities thus voting were very large. Should this projected reunion be consummated the result will constitute a splendid and powerful precedent which must inevitably give a strong impetus to the unsectarian movement.

THE PREACHING OF EVOLUTION.

We cannot expect to secure advantages without corresponding disadvantages. I have just spoken of the promising tendency to Christian unity in Scotland. But there is something else at the same time proceeding. There is a loosening of the safe old standards and a drifting from the old orthodoxy, which has its perils, and which, if it should go too far and too fast, may carry away some of the essential moorings without which a nation must slide into national atheism, as France has done and as Germany may do. The address of the moderator of the Free Church Assembly of Scotland, delivered at the General Assembly, is a startling manifesto in favor of the most advanced scientific thought. I have enjoyed Dr. Walter Ross Taylor's address in my reading of its eloquent and intellectual paragraphs, but at the same time I am just conservative enough, while I think I am fairly radical, to regret that so authoritative a representative leader in Britain should have committed himself to the standpoint he has assumed. I maintain to-day as I have ventured in my own humble individual capacity as a student to maintain for years, that with regard to the vexed and abstruse problems of philosophic science in relation to human origins, mundane genesis and cosmic developments, the Christian preacher is bound to be really agnostic. We cannot safely accept a single conclusion as proved by scientists which is purely hypothetical. We should be open to evidence and should accept whatever is actually demonstrated, knowing that the Bible can very well take care of itself without our clumsy apologetics. If the missing link should actually be discovered we would not run away from it as from a bogey, nor would we bury it out of our sight, if any higher critical data are substantiated by real testimony I should be ashamed of myself or any man who would hesitate to bow to fact. But Dr. Ross coolly and grandiloquently takes it for granted that the great evolution doctrine is incontrovertible. He then goes on to chide evolutionists in a gentle spirit for confusing the method with the cause. He reckons the Darwinian theory the great nineteenth-century discovery. He is a sincere evolutionist; but his fine sermon betrays that he is not at all com-fortable. He will not b. He might have waited with his broad, open mind, which is highly to be commended. He should not have committed the Free Church to the theory which is plausible and specious, indeed, but is shadowy, nebulous and unsubstantial for want of the very testimony needed to show that it is the divine method. A Scotchman above all men ought to know the value of the favorite verdict of Scotchmen: "Not proven." W DURBAN.

Change in Food

WORKS WONDERS IN HEALTH.

It is worth knowing that a change in food can cure dyspepsia. "I deem it my duty to let you know how Grape-Nuts food has cured me of indicestion.

"I had been troubled with it for years, until last year my doctor recommended Grape-Nuts food to be used every morning. I followed instructions and now I am entirely well.

"The whole family like Grape-Nuts. We use four packages a week. You are welcome to use this testimonial as you see fit. I am willing to give any information to any one who desires to see or write me regarding Grape-Nuts." Respectfully, Mrs. C. H. Lowe, 681 Parker St., Roxbury, Mass.

The reason Mrs. Lowe was helped by the use of Grape Nuts food is that the food is predigested by natural processes and therefore does not tax the stomach as the food she had been using; it also contains the elements required for building up the nervous system. If that part of the human body is in perfect working order, there can be no dyspepsia, for nervous energy represents the steam that drives the engine.

When the nervous system is run down, the machinery of the body works badly. Grape-Nuts food can be used by small children as well as adults. It is perfectly cooked and ready for instant use. doubted whether our people in England have been

Among Our English Churches.

Three causes, at least, have operated in rendering our work in England less effective than it might otherwise have been. The first, which need hardly be mentioned, and which operates to hinder the work of all the free churches, is the Establishment. This signifies far more than an American at first surmises. It includes not only the fact that the Church of England is a state church, and therefore supported by public funds, while other communions must not only support themselves but aid in its maintenance; but it brings in its train a series of petty annoyances and discriminations under which Nonconformists rest to the immense retarding of their labor. The only churches in England are those of the Establishment; all other religious meeting-places are only chapels. It is, therefore, the cause of no small astonishment to an Englishman to observe the legend "Church of Christ" on one of our buildings, as on the front of the prominently located church in Southampton. Whether his astonishmet passes into indignation when he learns we belong to the Nonconformist ranks will probably depend on his relation to the state church.

The second factor in our problem is the American character of our movement, which gives it the air of a missionary propaganda on a soil which all English people naturally regard as the basis, not the goal, of missionary work. It might be possible for them to conceive of Buddhist or Mohammededan missions in England, which they would be likely to regard with indifferent tolerance as quite harmless, and perhaps not devoid of amusing features. But Christian missions to England! And this well-nigh the twentieth century, with the labors of Augustine and his Christianizing monks some thirteen centuries in the past! Such reflec tions give the average Britain something of a shock as he sees a people with predominently American characteristics and supported by American missionary funds, laboring to convert him to views varying but slightly, as it seems at first glance, from the British Christian teachings of centuries. Yet such is the case. These dozen or fifteen churches were nearly all founded by Americans. H. S.Earl, the earliest of our workers on English soil, founded the church at Southampton in 1875, and afterwards preached for the church at Chester, and begun the work at Cheltenham. W. T. Moore, the most conspicuous figure for many years, began the work at Southport in 1878, Liverpool in 1880 and London a little later. Birkenhead was organized by J. M. Van Horn in 1887, who later preached at Chester; Chester itself was opened as a field in 1876 by M. D. Todd, who built the church at Liverpool later on. F. W. Troy started the church in Gloucester while preaching for Cheltenham and was for a time pastor at Liverpool. And what shall I say more, for time would fail me to speak of the work of J. J. Haley at Birkenhead, Richardson and J. H. Garrison at Southport, John A. Brooks and W. A. Foster, now followed by Earl M. Todd at West London Tabernacle, A. Martin and J. H. Bicknell. the present pastor at Liverpool, Mark A. Collins now at Chester, and Leslie W. Morgan who is just entering fully upon his work at Southampton. All these were Americans, and it is not strange that the movement as a whole is regarded as partaking of that national character. It is not to be supposed that a thing is taboo in England because it is American. On the contrary there is a very warm welcome to Americans and American ideas. Our speakers are eagerly listened to, and our books read with interest when they are worthy. But that is quite different from import ing a religious movement from abroad, for on religious matters th. Englishman is likely to think he is fairly well furnished. Then, too, it may be more successful then we in places in the States in avoiding the impression of a somewhat nervous and intolerant view of the gospel. It is not always easy to be firm in advocacy of the truth, and yet, so to speak, in a spirit of love as shall disarm that prejudice which is quick to rise against all appearance of exclusiveness and bigotry. No people so much as those who advocate a return to "the simplicity that is in Christ" need to prove themselves possessed of the largest view and the broadest sympathy, coupled with these factors; there must be recognized the financial limitations which have been imposed on our work, owing to the inability of the Foreign Society to make larger appropriations to this field and the very moderate resources of most of our people in England. What has been done thus far is owing almost wholly to the help from the States, ably supplemented by the generous gifts of Timothy Coop, of Southport, and later, by his like-minded and devoted sons, Joseph and Frank, who have backed nearly every enterprise our people in England have undertaken. But even these funds do not furnish forth adequately such a campaign as we need to organize there. The result is that our church buildings are not what we need, and frequently their location is far from favorable. This is true in London, where the force that is being exerted at the West London Tabernacle would be far more effective in another place. The church at Chester is admirably located, but it is a iron structure which people are quite likely to describe as "the tin church." At Birkenhead we have only a schoolroom, and at Liverpool the church though well located is but small. In Southport and Southampton alone are favorable location and adequacy of structure found. What we have in these and other places has been made possible by the Coops, but a great movement needs ampler resources than two or three even of the most generous men can supply. This limitation has also hampered our work in other ways. The men who preach for our churches have all made sacrifices so to do. This is true, not only of the Americans there, who could find more remunerative fields in the States, but of our English preachers as well Bro. Durban, who like Brearley, of Birkenhead, and Johnson, of Southport, came out of Spurgeon's college of preachers, was the pastor of a leading Baptist Church in Chester, where he first met Bro. Moore and became interested in our work. He left his people just after the completion of one of the handsomest church structures in that cathedral city to accept the small pastorate at Hornsey Tabernacle, London, to which work he adds his duties on the Christian Commonwealth. Similar statements might be made regarding others of our English leaders, like Spring, of Gloucester, and Rapkie, of Margate. So that it will be seen that this field requires the sacrifices of the foreign missionary work in addition to its peculiar difficulties, which are found neither in America or the Orient.

A third feature of our work there, which is scarcely short of an obstacle, is the presence of the "English Brethren," whose churches far exceed ours in numbers and resources. brethren are the outgrowth of our movement in its earliest phase, while the Christian Baptist was running its course; and apparently there are not a few among them who are yet unadvised that this preliminary publication has been discontinued. Holding fast to the declaration made by Mr. Campbell they, as it seems to us, occupy practically the position he did at the beginning of his career, and from which such advances were made by him and his coworkers later. The English brethren theoretically discard the pastorate, though in reality they possess it. Instrumental music was for a long time barred from their assemblies but is now admitted. Missionary societies are condemned by them, though they have an association whose purpose is similar. These points, therefore, need not divide their congregations from ours. But on the more vital question of the Lord's Supper they maintain a closeness of administration which strictly debars all who are not immersed believers, and the same view is taken of the right to contribute to the support of the church, no offerings being received save from members. The relations between these churches and our own have not been cordial, and though the very features mentioned have prevented them from becoming an aggressive force in England, still the tacit relationship supposed by the community to exist between us and them, as well as their open denunciation of our work as "American" and unscriptural, has had weight in depressing our influence. Yet it must be said that many of the old brethren are earnest and godly men and sincere lovers of truth. During the lectureships, especially at Birkenhead, Chester and Southport, many of them were present and co-operated heartily in the work, cordially endorsing every utterance upon the character of early Christianity and hailing the work as a much-needed contribution toward clearing the pathway of a united church. And conversation with some of their leaders revealed the fact that they would welcome warmer relations with us and that the hope of absolute unity might not be with-

If I have seemed to take much space in chronicling the hIndrances to our work in England, it is not because I take other than a hopeful view of its outcome. I amonly concerned to emphasize the sacrifices by which it has come to its present proportions and the heroic efforts which are put forth by our workers to maintain it and increase from year to year its effectiveness. And we are growing. Though all the churches are burdened with debts they are rising to the enterprise of enlargement. At the recent church anniversary in Southampton, Bro. Morgan put before his people the necessity of removing the church debt and becoming entirely self-supporting. These two watchwords he has nailed to the masthead, and we may believe they will be realized. The churches at Chester and Birkenhead are already preparing to build, and with added facilities their influence will be multiplied. In most cases our men are honored and welcomed in all interdenominational work. The Christian Commonwealth reaches a large circle of people outside our churches. Brearley, of Birkenhead, is the leader of the temperance movement in that city. Johnson, of Southport, is the secretary and leading spirit in the Free Church Council of the place, and the Sundayschool of that church is recognized as the best in the local association, and while our membership in the different churches is not rich nor influential as commonly reckoned, it is earnest and faithful, capable of great things as experience and growth mature, nor are our churches insular and indifferent to each other. They have meetings of the association as frequently as practicable, the preachers exchange pulpits and evangelistic meetings on occasion. They also unite in such concerted efforts as the gospel meetings of Bros. Romig and Hanna last year, which resulted in no little good, and in the lectureships which have just closed, and which have afforded some of us the happy opportunity of seeing the situation and knowing our English churches more intimately.

Paris and the Exposition-IV.

A MEDITATION IN THE LOUVRE.

It is natural for one to think of Paris this year as primarily the city of the Exposition, but I love much more to think of it as the city in which dwells the Louvre. Superlatives are always dangerous, especially when applied within the realm of art, but probably the majority will accept the statement that the Louvre is the greatest art gallery in the world. To be sure, there are no exact units of measurement by which to weigh one collection of pictures and statues over against another and get a mathematically correct result; but this is not altogether a disadvantage. If it removes the possibility of proving this superlative proposition, it also deprives any critic of the means of disproving it, and the whole thing falls back again on the judgment and feeling of the individual. To me the Louvre is the greatest art gallery in the world.

The Louvre is a satisfying collection because it contains, not only a large number of the masterpieces which are universally recognized as great, but many really lovable masterpieces. The distinction is clear, I think, between those products of artistic genius which demand and receive admiration by reason of the vigor of their conception and the perfection of their execution, and those which, in some subtle manner, take hold upon the affections of the beholder and make themselves loved. To take a pair of illustrations from the Vatican gallery, one admires the Laocoon without restraint or limit and it would be folly to call it other than a stupendous masterpiece, but it arouses no such feeling of warm personal attachment as does the Apollo Belvidere, which stands near it. Or again, to cite pictures instead of statuary, Michaelangelo's frescoes in the Sistine Chapel at Rome impress one almost painfully with their majesty, their depth of tragic significance half veiled in mystery, and the vastness of the genius which they embody; but Fra Angelico's frescoes in the Convent of San Marco at Florence warm the heart and win an almost personal affection. If the Sistine Chapel should be burned, I would feel that the world had sustained a great loss; if the Convent of San Marco should be burned, I would feel that I had sustained a great

If pictures and statues have souls-and for purposes of sympathetic appreciation we must assume that they have -then we may say that some are as the souls of the great men whom we admire, and some are as the souls of our friends whom we love. We do not all have the same friends and we cannot all love the same pictures. There are canons of artistic judgment, according to which we can give or withhold our approval, so that the verdict of all well-instructed beholders will be practically unanimous. But affection, whether toward people or pictures, is a purely personal matter, not to be regulated by universal rules. The vast and teeming canvases of the Venetian and Veronese masters are, some of them, worthy of all admiration. But no constellation of approving stars in the catalogue can force from me more than the coldest admission that Paul of Verona's Feast at Cana is an excellent piece of painting. It is excellent, very, but it is no special friend of mine. And in the Salon Carre of the Louvre I tiptoe in silent and unenthusiastic awe past Titan's grand Entombment, to spend a few minutes of cheerful companionship with Holbein's Erasmus, with which I am on terms of the most friendly intimacy.

The chief delight of the Louvre, to me, is not that it has so many masterpieces, but that it has so many with which I have been able to make friends. I was unfortunate enough to encounter an American once in the Vatican who insisted on appraising everything. One would have thought he was a tax-collector. It was not so bad when we were looking through the Pope's jubilee presents from the various sovereigns, for many of these derive their chief interest from their intrinsic value; but when he began to speculate as to how much the Daughter of Niobe would bring in the market if she wasn't so frightfully mutilated, and estimated that it would probably take more than a million dollars cash to buy the Lancoon, I fled. If he had put his price-mark on the Apollo, I would have done some deed of violence upon him, of which I would probably be sorry by this time. But he would have deserved it. One does not like to see his friends put upon the auctionblock in that cold-blooded way, even if they are marble friends. Any one who subjects the Venus de Milo to such treatment in my presence is hereby warned that I shall not hold myself responsible for the consequences, for the Venus is chief among my famo:s friends in the Louvre.

To my mind the only thing inadequate about this piece of Greek marble is its name. Undoubtedly it was meant by the sculptor of twenty-four centuries ago to represent Venus, probably as holding in her had the golden apple which Paris had awarded to her as the prize of beauty. But she represents much more than those feminine charms, accompanied by ethical irregularities which were personified in the Venus of Greek mythology. She embodies all that is noblest and most divine in womanhood. The dignity of bearing, the modest innocence, the majestic sweetness of that smile which lingers dimly in the corners of the mouth, while the eyes are grave, the absence of all coquettishness and all consciousness of her own beauty, the mysterious air of meditation on deep things-these are some of the charms and characteristics of my friend, the Venus de

I have said that she appears not conscious of her own beauty; perhaps it would be better to say not proud of it, not attempting to make capital out of it, but recognizing and wondering about it. We will assume that the left hand holding an apple, fourd near the statue, belonged originally to the Venus, and that the moment represented is the moment after the golden apple has been awarded to her as the fairest of gods and mortals. The more remarkable, then, is the modesty of her bearing. Perhaps it is an object-lesson in the gentle art-and there is no art more difficult-of gracefully receiving compliments and favors. Any blunderer can give gifts and pay compliments in a reasonably acceptable manner, if he have only a kindly disposition and be not by nature totally a fool. But to receive them with a gratitude which shall not be a cringing plea for more, a dignity which shall not be frigid or ungrateful, and withal an unassumed modesty-what loftiness of character, what fineness of nature does this demand. It is more blessed to give than to receive—and it is a great deal easier.

The Venus de Milo stands in a room alone at the end of a long corridor lined with statues. One sees her familiar form from afar, outlined against a dark background at the end of this marble vista. I used to spend a few minutes with her regularly every morning during a former visit to Paris, and this time nothing gave me so much of the sense of returning to a spot which had permanent worth for me as the first glimpse of the Venus, still standing there at the end of the corridor, still meditating upon that insoluble problem and still ready to honor with her friendship any sympathetic and appreciative visitor. Women are not all fickle, it seems. There are the marble ones, for instance—and there are some others.

My other famous friend in the Louvre is another Greek statue, the Winged Victory of Samothrace.

The figure is represented as standing on the bow of a galley returning victorious from a naval battle. It is sadly mutilated-head gone, arms gone, wings broken-but the life of the figure is still abundant and every line of it means force and action. In the poise of the body and the swirl of the draperies one can feel the rush of the wind and hear the dash of the waves at the bow of that victorious trireme, and the air seems still to pulsate with the song of triumph. There is no weariness of battle in that figure, no evidence of struggle, no suggestion of the agonizing hours when the fortune of war hung trembling in the balance—nothing but pure joy of victory. It is the part of a strong man to struggle and suffer and toil, and win in the end; to "go on forever and fail and go on again, to be mauled to the earth and rise," and to issue from the battle torn, bruised and exhausted, but triumphant. come from the battle unwearied and unwounded, singing the song of triumph in full strength—that is the very essence of divine Victory. be conceived of as a goddess, so must she be represented, and so she is represented in the Winged Victory of Samothrace. New York Letter.

The tenth annual report of the "Free Lectures to the People" under the auspices of the school board for the boroughs of Manhattan and the Bronx has just been published and is interesting as an educational document, because it represents the largest free lecture course in the world, and also because it sets forth a unique feature of adult education. Series of lectures were delivered at 51 different places in the city and a total of 1.871 lectures were delivered, 1,314 of which were illustrated by stereopticon, 102 by experiments and 455 without illustration of any kind. The range of the subject-matter of this course is wide and varied, and as a consequence it appeals to all sorts and conditions of men. Dr. Lupziger, the supervisor, says in his report: "The lecture course gives to the adult a new hope. It gives to the poor people larger visions and loftier ideals, and puts them in touch with noble souls. It has brought beauty into many a humble home and has contributed thus to the happiness of thousands." What New York is doing in this respect many other city schools may do also, and in this way extend something of the school privileges to the adult population of the community. It has been my happy lot to lecture on this course for the past four years, and I know something of it excellent work by personal experience. The same methods of illustration, viz., the stereopticon and experiment might be used to a limited extent in religious instruction also with fine results.

The drift of several so-called religious journals is plainly indicated by two prominent periodicals of New York with which I have had more or less to do in the past, and therefore know something of their spirit and aim. I refer to the Outlook and Independent, both of which, religiously speaking, have declined. Both of these papers were launched ministers of the gospel and won their first successes and their reputation on the patronage of their religious constituency of all denominations more or less. For years their tone was distinctively religious, much space being given to religious matters. But in the latter years secularism has taken full possession, and though each of these editorial forces are presided over by a preacher of the gospel, they give precious little space to things religious. They have given themselves over to the advocacy of most everything secular. Politics, sociology, education, current literature, morality and general worldliness make up the pages of these formerly great religious papers. Some two years ago the Outlook dropped their religious department, and a few weeks since the Independent followed suit. Is it not time that Christian men should awake to the fact that these and other papers have turned away from their high and holy ideals? They are not any longer religious journals. It certainly is a great pity that such able and reliable advocates of the cause of Christ should forsake their distinctive religious advocacy of the past and go into the scramble of the world for secular gain.

President Hadley at Yale yesterday preached the baccalaureate sermon to the graduating class though himself not a minister. His text was: "Followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises." The kernel of the discourse, the best thing he said, was: "Remember that however much you may be able to dazzle the multitude, or lead the multitude, the respect of your own conscience is under God the one enduring possession. In patience, in the profoundest sense of the word, shall you possess your own souls." So much is being said about colleges, and especially about the great Eastern institutions of learning, that perhaps a word to young people, thinking at this season of entering college in the fall, is not out of the way. By all means go to the small country college or the college supported by the Church of Christ if possible. Much of the talk about the superiority of Yale, Harvard, etc., over the smaller colleges is all nonsense. There is more in the name of such schools than in the superior work done in them. They are finely equipped, but they do not do better or more thorough work than hundreds of smaller colleges do in the same branches. Besides, the extravagance of living and the temptations to evil are much greater in the great colleges. It is to be hoped that men of means will adequately endow our good schools, such as Kentucky University, Drake, Hiram, Eureka, Milligan, et al., and make them the power for good they ought to be. The next advanced step we should take is in the direction of college endowment, that our schools may be thoroughly equipped.

The last quarterly meeting of the New York district, of the C. W. B. M. was held at the 169th St. Church afternoon and eve of June 14th. All the ministers present made addresses and Mrs. Rummell was re-elected president and Mrs. Kramer was re elected secretary for the coming year. B. Q. Denham will take a vacation through August and J. M. Philputt will take two months' vacation, July and August. Bros. Harlan and Keevil have not reported their plans for the resting season. The work at the 169th St. Church keeps up remarkably well considering the hot weather. Both Sunday schools and the church services are quite well attended. But in the course of ten days many of our regulars will be out of the city. Some will go to Europe, some to Colorado, some to Sing Sing on the Hudson, some to the Catskills, some into Pennsylvania, some into New England and others to the seaside, and so we will be much scattered abroad. So it is with many other congregations. But let us go everywhere preaching the word. S. T. WILLIS.

China Letter.

The Middle Kingdom is not only a pretty, artistic garden of towers, lakes and minarets; it is a mighty empire. It possesses all the variety of a nation's life. Above all of its art, literature and ethics, sin stands out as the comprehensive summary of its social, industrial and political state.

Heatbenism is the blight of the human race. In this non-Christian colossus of ancient learning and venerated superstitions a new life is in embryo. The vital germ of the gospel seed has not yet received its distinctive form. It is safe to say the Christianization of China is yet in its rudimentary condition. In the eighteen provinces four hundred millions of people are in the throes of imminent revolution. Whether the upheaval will be peaceful or otherwise, it is not easy to forecast.

The political horizon is very dark. Intrigue and murder lurk within the Imperial Palace. The deposed emperor is reported to be dying. The new puppet heir-apparent is a mere nonentity in the hands of the wily Empress Dowager. It is unfortunate, too, just at this time that the Germans should be provoking so much hostility in the north of China. Kiaschon is the open port in the north for German trade and industries. Recently it has been the scene of much turbulent action. We trust the sons of the Fatherland will give a good representation of what Christian civilization can and will do for China.

F. E. Meigs is doubtless by this time at home. He should have audience everywhere. He can present the needs and claims of China with wisdom and grace. He is one of "the big four," viz.,

Wharton, Smith, Williams and Meigs, who were sent from a great work at home to a greater work abroad. The Christian girls' school is looking for the return of Miss Emma Lvon.

James Ware and family are at Hiram, Ohio. James Ware is one of the busiest missionaries in China. Has been nearly twenty years in China. His daughters, Lillie and Grace, enter Hiram University. It would be a splendid endowment if the sons and daughters of all our foreign missionaries could be enabled to ensure a university training in some one of our great educational institutions. Our children cannot best develop in a heathen environment. They are the children of the West and should enjoy its privileges. This is a great mission field problem. Solution is invited.

STATE MISSIONARY CONVENTION.

Our state convention this year at Paris, June 11-15, was a success. Death in my congregation kept me away, but this is the report of those who attended. The women led off well, and while I have no figures from them it is the verdict of all that their work is growing rapidly, and all debts paid. The old officers were re-elected and a strong stride forward is their aim for the coming

By the time the men were ready for their work about 450 delegates, full of enthusiasm and hope, were on the ground and the program was carried out with much zeal and harmony.

The reports from the field have never been better, and that of B. B. Sanders, corresponding secretary, was exceptionally good. He was employed 365 days, p eached 422 sermons, visited 68 places, held 14 meetings, baptized 202, received 60 by letter and 41 from other sources, making a grand total of 303 additions. He organized two Ladies' Aid Societies, reorganized three churches and three Sunday-schools, located 10 preachers, ordained one, wrote 2,494 letters and contributed 35 articles to the Courier. Where is there a better report than this? God bless Bro. Sanders.

And his financial showing is just as good. He raised in the field in cash and pledges, $1,856.65. For various other purposes, $2,068.65, making a total of $3,925.30. He not only paid his own salary, but turned into the treasury in cash and pledges, $485.25.

Summing up the work of all the evangelists we have the following figures: Days, 2541; places, 393; sermons, 2808; bap+isms, 746; letter, 559; otherwise, 302; total 1,607; churches organized, 14; Sunday-schools, 16; Endeavor Societies, 11; C. W. B. M., 1; Aid Societies, 5; churches reorganized 7; Sunday schools, 3; preachers located, 10; ordained, 1; cash and pledges, $9,027.75; for local purposes, $4,338.25; making a grand total of $13,366.00.

Before passing judgment on this work I wish the reader to know that we have only about 30,-000 people engaged in it. There are perhaps that many more in the state, but like the Jews and Samaritans, we have no dealings with each other. They are generally known as "Antis." He should also know that these 30,000 brethren are scattered over a territory as large as half a dozen of our largest states.

The old board consisting of Anson Rainey, G.D. Smith, M. M. Davis, T. E. Shirley and C. W. Gibson, was continued, and J. C. Mason was added to Since then the board has re-elected B. B. Sanders as Cor. Secy., and he thereby becomes a member also. At this meeting A. J. Bush and Sam Smith were elected as general evangelists, and several others were located in different districts. J. B. Hoston was continued at Galveston, J. C. Dickson at Tyler, E. C. Boynton at Huntsville, T. H. Patterson at Beaumont and Frank Lanehart at Bowie.

One of the best features of the work is that the number of contributing churches is rapidly increasing. Three years ago there were only 32, last year there were 77, but we now have 158. But only about $2,500 was pledged at the convention, but this amount will be increased.

J. N. Crutcher, aided by his new wife and good church, did the work of entertaining to the satisfaction of all.

Officers for the coming year are: Judge J. S. Sherrill, Greenville, president; Judge A. E. Wilkinson, Austin, vice-president; Clement Few, Paris, Secretary, and Frank Holmes, Vineland, assistant secretary. And the next convention goes to Galveston, June 20-24, 1901.

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

I am stirred up by a letter written to me by a large-hearted, successful Christian business man. It is well to hear from men now and again who are not in the ministry. It would do us good to hear from such persons frequently. The pulpit ought to consult the pew. The people should be encouraged to speak to the preachers. The latter will show their good sense by listening respectfully to the former. How do the matters in which preachers are especially interested appear to business men? Having put the question in this way let us listen to them when they speak.

This good man says: "What we want is qualified, consecrated leaders." Emphasize the last word. Print it in large letters. Leaders are wanted. This is the opinion of this Christian gentleman. Do you doubt the correctness of this opinion? Any cause, to succeed must have Leaders. Our congregations are miniature democratic republics—but leadership is needed, nevertheless. On the larger theater the same need exists. Leaders, Not Lords, are needed. The difference is obvious.

But to lead one must go before. The LEADER does not sit in a comfortable office and issue orders. A LORD may do this, but not a leader. Paul required Timothy to lead, not drive. "Be an example," he said. He himself was a leader. "Follow me," was his word, "even as I follow Christ." Whatever the leader would have the people do he must himself do first. To aspire to leadership is to aspire to a difficult position. Lordship is not difficult; leadership is.

In the Christian life "consecrated" leaders are needed—men who will go before "in word, in manner of life, in love, in faith, in purity." As are the leaders, so will be the people.

Another quotation from the letter of this business man is as follows: "We must consolidate and endow our colleges." He sees that the churches are dependent on our institutions of learning for leaders. For this reason our colleges ought to be adequately endowed. The educational problem is the problem before the Disciples of Christ at the present time. There is now no other question equal to it in importance. How can the brethren be brought to see this? That some see it is an encouraging fact; that many fail to see it is discouraging. The leaders in all the reformations of the church were educated men. Luther, Calvin, Knox, Wesley, Campbell were men of college and university training. Where would the Disciples be to-day, and what, but for the educational work of Alexander Campbell? The founding of Bethany College was the wisest thing that he did. The value of this institution to the current effort to call the people back to New Testament Christianity cannot be estimated. Honor be to the men who in any capacity are serving the cause; but let us give especial honor to those who, with an apostolic zeal, are attempting to stir us up on the educational problem. Do you see how the question presents itself to this man of affairs? He is wise. Half educated men have done good work. Men without a college training are turning souls to the Lord. Some of our most valuable men were destitute of a college training. If they rendered valuable service without an education, much more valuable would have been their work if they could have had the discipline of a regular college curriculum. And the trend of this present time indicates that educated men in the ministry will be in greater demand in the future than they have been in the past, than they are now, wherefore "we must consolidate and endow our colleges."

One more quotation: "I tell you, I do have the highest admiration for our preachers who work so cheaply, and many times without reward at all (here below). It is this consecration that has caused our success in a large measure."

Since I have been going among our churches I have had revelations!

I had no conception, when I was in a comfortable pastorate, of the experiences of men with whom I have become acquainted since the beginning of my itinerancy. There are sacrifices made on the home field equal to any sacrifices of which I have heard on the foreign field. If our young men are not in dead earnest the signs are misleading. So far as money is concerned they would do better to serve as mechanics or farm hands. I stand in their presence with uncovered head. Their names do not appear in our papers. It is probable that you never heard of them. I know them. I have been in their pulpits and in their homes. We wax eloquent over the work of "the fathers," and it is well for us so to do; but there was no more self-denial and heroism on their part than is now shown by their sons and grandsons. There is not an extravagant syllable in this statement. These sentences are written under a self-restraint. My admiration for "the fathers," is great and so also is my admiration for the good men who are now filling the pastoral office among us. They are worthy sons of noble sires. There are, no doubt, selfish men in our ministry. There are men in the Christian ministry for what they can make out of it. Of this I am fully persuaded; but they are, believe me, the exception. It is seldom that I meet them.

"It is this consecration that has caused our success in a large measure," says my correspondent—and in this he is correct.

But is it right that so large a part of the selfdenial and consecration should be left to the preachers? Ought not every member of the church to practice self-denial and be an example of intelligent consecration in the work of Christianizing the world? I am glad to believe that there is among the Disciples of Christ an increasing sense of stewardship. Business men more and more are conducting their business on Christian principles and are using their means to aid their fellowmen with a steadily increasing liberality. Systematic giving is thought of and practiced more than it was a few years ago. In a recent letter I called attention to results in the New York church—the congregation for which B. Q. Denham preaches.

Not long ago I had the privilege of looking over a business man's account, and this is what I found: Beginning with 1897 and Including 1899 his gross earnings were $69:870.42. This was $5,374.65 a year. During these thirteen years he contributed to the work of our Lord $11,458.97—an average of $881.45 per year. This he was able to do by using system in his offerings to the work of the Master. The number of persons among us who are using their means in this way increases year by year. I can tell you of men and women who give all except enough to furnish them with plain food and cheap clothing, and this they do for Christ's sake. It is a good thing to go among the brethren and learn what they are animated.

A Union Meeting.

Mention of a union meeting held Sunday, June 3, in a tent in a grove six miles east of Ladoga, Montgomery County, I d., should be made in your paper. The Ladoga, Roachdale, New Ross, Jamestown, North Salem, New Maysville, Fountain, Bether, and Barnard Churches were represented. Preachers present—C. C. Smith, Cincinnati, O.; T. J. Legg, Logansport; W. T. Brooks, L. E. Murry, H. C. Patterson, W. H. Alford, Henry Ashley, A. W. Conner and L. T. Van Cleave. Prof. W. E. M. Hackleman furnished song books and the music.

The day was damp and cool, but a good-sized and very orderly and attentive crowd was present. The sermons of the morning were by T. J. Legg and H. C. Patterson, followed by the communion, presided over by W. T. Brooks.

Following intermission for dinner came the address of the day on Missions by C. C. Smith, of the Home Society. This was a most happy and effective appeal for a deeper missionary spirit and a larger liberality on the part of our brotherhood in carrying on this great work. T. J. Legg followed with an appeal for a mission offering. Over $100 was soon given in cash and pledge. This was a splendid crowning of the day's work, as many good brethren present had hitherto felt no obligation resting on them in this vital work of the church. The seed sown in that address will bear much precious fruit in the oncoming years.

The brethren everywhere should plan such gatherings. The latent energy in the Christian Church is wonderful, such gatherings will make it wonderfully active and produce wonders. It was decided to make this meeting an annual one on first Sunday in July.

As one born out of due time, the writer was called to make a fifteen-minute address on "Temperance." The goodness and patience of the audience was fully demonstrated by their attentive reception of a few scattering shot into the political hive where the saloon lives and thrives.

The Christian brotherhood has a great heart. Touch it in the spirit of the Master and streams of liberality that will make the desert glad will flow forth. I love thy kingdom Lord.

WORKING IN A GOOD CAUSE.

"In the institution where I am employed as nurse (The Home for Aged Women) we find many ladies suffering from gastric trouble caused by coffee

"My own personal experience is that since a child I have been a moderate drinker of coffee but most of the latter years have suffered from acidity of the stomach, sluggish liver and nervousness.

"I finally gave up coffee entirely, about three years ago, using hot water in its place. Of course, after removing the cause the symptoms disappeared, but I seemed to need a beverage more strengthening than hot water, as my occupation of nurse required considerable exertion. I began to look about for a suitable breakfast beverage and undertook the preparation of one by browning some wheat berries and using that as coffee, but the result was far from satisfactory. Finally I came across Postum Food Coffee, on a visit to my home in Roselle, N. J., and found it exactly fitted the case.

"I have been using it regularly and introduced it to our institution. When it was first served it was not satisfactory, but I looked into the matter and insisted on having it boiled fully fifteen minutes after the actual boiling had started, not counting the time it was on the stove before boiling began. The next time it appeared you would not know it was the same article, it was so much improved. Several of the patients decided to use it to the exclusion of coffee and I found that its use reduced the number of cases of indigestion. The result has been very gratifying, and for two years now, Postum Food Coffee has been in use at the Home.

"Mrs. Matilda Seaver and Miss Anna Merrill are desirous that their names be used to help forward the good cause. My mother has been greatly helped by the discontinuance of coffee. She was formerly subject to cramps, but they have entirely disappeared since she has abandoned coffee and taken up Postum Food Coffee. Respectfully," Miss E. Stryker, Elizabeth, N. J.

The School of Pastoral Helpers-Some Questions Answered.

Since it has been announced that this school will open September 18, in Cincinnati, Ohio, we have been asked several questions and some of them more than once. We have chosen this way of answering them.

Our first announcement is printed and ready to send to those who apply.

"Will this school prepare one for the mission field?" The primary purpose of the school is to train young women of good education and deep interest in the Master's kingdom to become efficient helpers to the pastors in the cities and larger towns. Those well fitted for this work would no doubt be in some measure fitted to serve him any-

Will the number of students be limited?" Yes, we think this necessary lest we might not be able to do justice to those who come, in the way of practical work.

"Will there be a conference held on this line of work at the Kansas City Convention?" Yes, we hope for a large, enthusiastic one.

"Do you believe that many of our churches will be willing to employ an assistant to the pastor?" Yes, just as soon as they know how much it will add to the success of their work. Besides, we are hopeful that some will enter the school who desire to become efficient workers and yet do not expect to depend upon it for a living.

Who furnishes the money to carry on the We expect those interested in saving the cities to do this and believe in them sufficiently to guarantee the payment of all bills.

"How long is the course of training?" As arranged at present it is but one session from September 18, 1900, to May 13, 1901.

Illinois Notes.

Our State Jubilee Convention will be held at Bloomington, October 2, 3, 4, and the prospect for a great gathering is fine. There is reason to hope for a one-fare rate from both railway associations, and this will add much to the attendance.

The district conventions are good, and many county conventions have added to the general interest.

Nine months of our missionary service makes the following showing: Men employed, 28; days' service, 1,160; meetings held, 35; sermons delivered, 1,142; conversions, 457; other additions, 291; churches contributing, 158; amount contributed, $1,733.06.

Our missionary year closes July 31, and unless churches and preachers send their gifts soon it will be too late as our books, close with the year. There is more work before us, but we cannot do it without the co-operation of our brethren. Any church will give to state missions if it is asked to do it. It is your cause, brethren, and we are your servants. Why not put us in position to do a large service?

Our missions are doing well because we hold on to them until they are housed and have regular preaching. This is slower than we could wish, but it is better than to 'open new fields and then let them go to ruin from lack of attention. Our work is thorough. J. FRED JONES, Sec.

"Decision Day" in Englewood Sunday-school.

Our school started out this year to observe the last Lord's day of each quarter as Decision Day. On the first of these days-March 25th-there were eight conversions from the school. Since then four of the children have made the good confession, and on last Lord's day (Decision Day) six more of the boys and girls went forward; three each at the morning church service and at the school session-our pastor, Bro. Kindred, extending the invitation and taking the confessions at both services. Numbered among these child-converts are the son (in his 12th year) and daughter (in her 11th year) of the writer, whereat we do greatly rejoice. The naturalness with which they reached their decision to take this step is refreshing to contemplate. Without either of them ever having been even asked by father or mothermuch less urged-to unite with the church, they each on the evening of last Decision Day made known to us their desire to confess the Savior when the next Decision Day should come. During the intervening three months we frequently conversed with them regarding their determination and made it the subject of prayer and Scripture reading with them. Not once did they falter in their resolve, but moved steadily forward to the consummation of their faith in the Son of God, the confession of his name before witnesses and their baptism into him. Englewood Sunday-school can say out of its experience: "Blessed be Decision Day!"

New Railroad to San Francisco.

Announcement is made of the opening for passenger business of the newly completed extension of the Santa Fe Route to San Francisco, opening for freight business having been made several weeks ago. The fact marks an event of no little national importance, as a new transcontinental line thus enters the field of business between the great California port and the East, so long monopolized by the one railroad, to which heretofore San Erancisco and the other cities of central California have been restricted. A distinct benefit to trade and travel may confidently be expected to result in the form of better freight and passenger transportation, which commonly follows railway competition for public patronage. By this step, also, the Santa Fe Road has materially added to its source of revenue. It is the only railroad with track and trains under one ownership and management all the way from Chicago to San Francisco, as heretofore it has enjoyed that distinction be-tween Chicago and Los Angeles and San Diego. The advantages resulting from such undivided responsibility are apparent, as it means uniformity of policy and prompt through service, which in a system of the high standing of the Santa Fe signify much to the traveler and the shipper.

The route is rich in attractions for the tourist. All the way from eastern Colorado to the California boundary it runs practically over a continuous mountain top, averaging as high above sea level as is the summit of Mount Washington in New Hampshire. Mountain passes, extinct volcanoes, petrified forests, prehistoric ruins, Indian Pueblos, the Yosemite and the Grand Canon of the Colorado River in Arizona are some of the features, certainly a striking list for those who are ignorant of the extraorninary interest of travel through the southwestern portion of our country. Also an independent route is thus established through San Francisco to Hawaii, the Philippines and the Orient, on the freight traffic with which the Santa Fe has already secured a strong hold, and now proposes to reach out vigorously for the passenger

The Acme.... Smelting and Refining Company

Offers to Investors for a Short Time Unequaled Advantages.

IT IS A WELL-KNOWN FACT

That a custom smelter, properly equipped and operated, is the most certain source of revenue in the mining business.

ITS SUCCESS

Is not contingent upon the output of any one mine or group of mines, but draws its support from a large number of mines in the district where it is located. There are 100 producing and paying mines within a convenient distance of our smelter site and at least 200 more would be developed if there was a custom smelter conveniently located to which ore could be shipped for treatment.

A CUSTOM SMELTER

Bears the same relation to mining that a grist mill does to an agricultural district, with the profits greatly in favor of a custom smelter. The usual net profits of a custom smelter are about $3.00 per ton.

WE HAVE GIVEN YEARS

Of careful study to our plans and know that we are warranted in our undertaking-the erection of a custom smelting plant. Risks which exist in all ordinary mining operations have been carefully eliminated from our plans. We have water, fluxes, an inexhaustible supply of ore and a clear field.

WE CONTRACT NO DEBTS. OUR MOTTO IS: CASH or NOTHING.

A CUSTOM SMELTER HAS THESE ADVANTAGES OVER ALL KINDS OF COMMERCIAL BUSINESS:

The product of a smelter invariably sells for cash.

The ore smelted is ample security for the expense of smelting.

Profits are always large, often reaching 50 per cent. annually on the par value of the stock. 2.

Charges for smelting are always collected before the "matte" or refined ore is delivered from the

The "Mother's Room."

I'm awfully sorry for poor Jack Roe;
He's the boy that lives with his aunt, you know;
And he says his house is filled with gloom
Because it has got no "mother's room."
I tell you what, it is fine enough
To talk of "boudoirs" and such fancy stuff,
But the room of rooms that seem best to me,
The room where I'd rather be,
Is mother's room, where a fellow can rest,
And talk of the things his heart loves best.

What if I do get dirt about,
And sometimes startle my aunt with a shout?
Its in mother's room, and, if she don't mind,
To the hints of others I'm always blind.
May be I lose my things—what then?
In mothers room I find them again.
And I never denied that I litter the floor
With marbles and tops and many things more;
But I tell you, for boys with a tired head,
It is jolly to rest it on mother's bed.

Now poor Jack Roe, when he visits me,
I take him to mother's room, you see,
Because it's the nicest place to go
When a fellow's spirits are getting low;
And mother, she's always kind and sweet,
And there's always a smile poor Jack to greet,
And somehow the sunbeams seem to glow
More brightly in mother's room, I know,
Than anywhere else, and you'll never find gloomore any old shadow in mother's room.

Their Experiment.

BY L. T. RIGHTSELL.

"Can you not see your way to do it, Charles? It is my heart's desire that you make the attempt. I believe that your Christian vows require that you should deal with these poor men differently from the customary way. Pray consider the matter."

Charles Elwood heard the request of his wife with a somewhat perturbed spirit. Not that he was vexed, for he loved her and always asked her counsel in business matters, but he doubted the wisdom of what she now proposed. He said: "Mary, I have not forgotten my Christian obligations; I want to fulfill them as perfectly as I can, but if I fail to look to my own interests how am I to hold up, and how can I bear to see my own family brought to need through my imprudence?"

"There are only we two," said Mary, "and I would rather come to want than to close my heart to the claims of charity. But I hardly believe we will come to want by your doing this. God will not forsake us for a good deed."

Charles smiled. He was a practical man of business and looked at all things from a business standpoint. He did not doubt God's care for his own, yet he was a firm believer in works as well as faith. Through his wife's influence he had become a Christian, and he gave her credit for unlimited goodness of heart, but he imagined he possessed the advantage in respect of business judgment. He was owner and business manager of an iron foundry in West Virginia, and had obtained what he no w possessed by his own unaided efforts, having worked up from the bottom. He was not now wealthy, as compared with many others, but he owned and operated a plant where something near a hundred men were employed. He understood all the minutiæ of the work and fancied he also understood the management of his men. Unlike most other operators, he regarded them as human creatures, and never held himself aloof in any spirit of false pride. There had been much serious trouble in other places between capital and labor, but none had ever arisen between him and his men. To-day he had spoken to his wife of the stringency of the times and announced his purpose of cutting the wages of his employees. He regretted the step and feared somewhat the results, but he trusted that he would be able to make them comprehend. In answer to his wife's queetions he he had admitted that the step he contemplated was not yet an absolute necessity, but he regarded it as a matter of prudence; it would become a matter of necessity in time, and it was better to take time by the forelock.

Mary earnestly entreated him to reconsider his determination and to endeavor to hold out awhile longer. She was willing to cut down their own living expenses to the lowest possible figure, if he would try to maintain the present scale of wages, so as to assure to the employees the means which every one of them so sorely needed.

Charles Elwood and his wife were not living in luxury. Their dwelling was only a cottage far out from the fashionable part of the town, and they had no elegant furniture and no retinue of servants. The oper atives certainly had no cause for envy as they contemplated their manner of living. Charles believed that he and his wife should not be expected to deny themselves to the extent that they ran the risk of losing all. But since his wife was so decided in her opinion that he should not at present make a reduction of wages, he yielded and promised that it should not be done.

This decision he announced to Carl Saxe, his foreman, the next morning, with the request that he should make it known to his men. Carl gladly received this permission, and at the same time thanked Mr. Elwood for himself. "It will be a very welcome piece of news to the men," he said; "many of them were becoming very uneasy."

"The uneasiness is on my side, now," said Mr. Elwood; "I am afraid, Carl, that my decision may have to be reversed at any time. I can trust you and I can tell you now that the future looks rather gloomy."

Carl left him and in a little while the sound of cheering was heard from the sheds. In his heart Mr. Elwood was glad that he had the power to give at least temporary joy to others.

It was a time of great uncertainty in the industrial world. Everywhere the wages of working men were being reduced, or still worse, factories were being closed. Mr. Elwood held out as long as he could, but one day, a few months after his conversation with his wife, he again called Carl Saxe to him, and requested him to assemble the men in the smelting shed. He had kept Carl, as well as his wife, in his confidence all the time, and now he had decided to appeal to the reason and good sense of his workmen.

Facing them as they stood expectantly before him, he stated in a plain way the condition of affairs and said in conclusion: "Now, I have refrained from cutting wages up to this time because I sincerely desired the welfare of you all. But I find I can no longer carry on the business as matters now stand. There are two courses, one of which I must take; either I must reduce wages or shut down the works. Which shall it be? I leave it for you to decide."

There was a short consultation, so short that Mr. Elwood was led to believe that the matter had been canvassed before, and then Carl Saxe stepped forward as spokesman and said: "The men say that they will stand by you, Mr. Elwood. They ask that you will do the best you can by them and allow the work to go on." Mr. Elwood did the best he could for them. It was now the beginning of November, and he knew there was suffering and hardship in store for many of them. His wife went every day with food, clothing and medicine to the poor homes of some of the workmen. Occasionally she heard a word of bitterness and complaint from some overworked, underfed and poorly clad woman. Mrs. Elwood was troubled, but not conscience striken by such expressions, and felt that they were due to an unreason caused by physical suffering. She was conscious of having done her best to aleviate this suffering and on that account her spirit was less troubled.

As the holidays approached and the severity of the winter increased, the condition of things here and in other parts of the country grew worse. Mr. Elwood was aware of the fact that at least two or three of his men belonged to the disaffected class known as anarchists and did not doubt that they were using their bad influence with the others, though he hoped that their influence was small. But as the days went by he was sure he could detect a change for the worse.

Occasionally he would come upon groups of the men discussing with suppressed voices something they evidently did not wish him to hear. When he approached to the groups quickly dissolved, the men going their separate ways. He fancied that there was less freedom than formerly, that their bearing toward him was becoming more and more constrained. One day the mentioned the matter to Carl, but even he seemed disinclined to be confidential, and would not discuss the matter.

It was the day before Christmas. The news from other places where there were many disturbances and the suspicious aspect of affairs at home had preyed upon the mind of Mr. Elwood and he felt that the approaching holiday season was to be the most unhappy of his life. He was not at all surprised when Carl came to him late in the afternoon and said: "Mr. Elwood, I believe it is the intention of the men to send a committee to wait on you this evening." He said nothing more and Mr. Elwood asked nothing by way of explanation. He felt that inquiry was useless.

At his home that evening he and his wife were sitting alone, both in a despondent frame of mind, feeling that they had been misunderstood and that their effort to practice the Golden Rule had resulted in a failure. But both were brave. They did not intend to evade any issue that might arise and so they sat talking, sad but tranquil till nine o'clock. At that hour the tread of many feet was heard approaching the house and soon a knock rosounded upon the door. Mr. Elwood arose and openened it and was confronted by Carl, who said quietly: "Mr. Elwood, the men are here and have a little matter to trouble you with." Mrs. Elwood was by her husband's side and she said pleasantly: "Have them come right in here, Carl, they are all welcome."

"No," said Carl, "I presume they would rather not trouble you in that way, as there are so many; but there is a matter we have been keeping secret for a time, sir; no doubt you have noticed it and thought strange. Well, you know we are poor, and the outlook just now is dark, but if you will accept it we wish to present you a slight token of our esteem and appreciation. Here is our Christmas present, sir."

Mr. Elwood in a dazed sort of a way took the package that was handed to him. His surprise was so great that he could scarcely realize what he was doing as he undid the package and held up to view a handsome overcoat. For a little while he could say nothing; it all flashed through his mindthe explanation of the reserved bearing of the men and their secret conversations which they were so careful not to have him overhear. He had imagined that they were all becoming disaffected and that they were even meditating some evil deed. When he could command his voice he told them in a few simple words of his great thankfulness and great appreciation of their gift. With hearty cheers they responded to his expressions of kindly feeling for them, and then one by one they came and shook the hands of himself and his wife.

When the men had gone the two sat again by the fireside, but with feelings entirely different from those that had possessed them a little while before. Anxiety and trouble had vanished and within their hearts was the deepest gratitude to the God whom they had endeavored to serve by benefiting his creatures.

The Temple of Music.

The Temple of Music designed by Esenwein & Johnson, of Buffalo, for the Pan-American Exposition, will cover a plot of ground 150 feet square, and will be located on the northwest corner of the Esplanade and the Court of Fountains. The exterior of this handsome building will be treated architecturally after the style of the Spanish Renaissance. It will be octagonal in shape, with octangle pavilions at each corner. The main entrance will be through the pavilion on the corner of the Esplanade and Court of Fountains. Each of the facades of the main building will have a richly ornamented colonnade. Between the columns will be large window openings and ornamental panels, each bearing a portrait bust of some musical composer. The cornice, frieze and balustrade of the main building will be designed in a florid adaption of the Spanish Renaissance, and the balustrade will carry tablets bearing the names of noted musicians and composers. On the corners above the pavilions will be groups of statuary representing music, dancing, etc.

The chief feature of the drum of the dome will be star-shaped windows resembling those seen in the ancient Spanish mission buildings. These windows will light the interior of the auditorium. The dome and the roofs of the pavilions will be richly gilded. Gold and brilliant coloring will be freely used in all the exterior decoration. The crown of the dome will be 136 feet above the grade of the Court of Fountains, and the Temple and its pavilions will form a very attractive part of the landscape scheme of the entire group of Exposition

The auditorium, which will seat 1,200 persons, will be a few steps up from the grade of the building, and in addition the restaurants and balconies will give a further seating accommodation for 1,600 people. The other pavilions, in addition to the one used for the main entrance, will be occupied by the stage and for a fully equipped restaurant, with the necessary kitchen adjuncts, serving rooms, etc. The auditorium is only a few steps below the floor grade of the restaurant, and the partition between the restaurant and auditorium will be glazed, so that people seated at the tables can overlook the audience and enjoy the concert or entertainment at the same time. The flatdomed roof of the auditorium will be supported by eight massive piers. Between the piers will be large arches opening into the galleries, to the main entrance and leading to the stage. Over each of the eight large arches will be a cartouch bearing an inscription indicating one of the grand divisions of Music Oratorio, Grand Opera, Symphonic

Music, Lyric Music, etc. The lighting will be through the star-shaped windows previously mentioned, passing through eight ceiling lights, each having 320 square feet of glass. The front of the galleries will be decorated with a frieze of singing cherubs. An elaborate and complete system of heating and ventilating will be adopted for this building. Numerous and commodious entrances and exits will be provided, so that absolute safety to visitors will be assured The interior as well as the exterior of the Temple of Music will be treated with a view to securing the best architectural effects.

In the Temple of Music will be erected one of the largest and finest organs in the United States. It will be an exceedingly beautiful and complete instrument, with all the latest improvements in organ building. It will have four manuals, and about fifty speaking stops, and will be voiced on three different wind pressures. The action will be the most complete style of tubular pneumatic. The mechanical contrivances and combinations will be most complete and include many varieties not hitherto used. Of the four manuals, the great organ will have 14 stops, two 16-foot stops, six 8-foot stops, three 4-foot stops, one 2-foot stop, a twelfth and a four-rank mixture.

The swell organ will have fourteen stops, one 16-foot stop, nine 8-foot stops, three 4foot stops and a three-rank mixture.

The choir organ will have eleven stops, one 16-foot stop, seven 8-foot stops, two 4foot stops and one 2-foot stop.

The sole organ will have three 8-foot stops and one 4-foot stop.

The pedal organ will have ten stops, one 32-foot stop, five 16-foot stops, one 10-foot stop and three 8-foot stops.

There will be a number of couplers, pedal movements and adjustable combinations of the most modern type. The case will be of Gothic design, to harmonize with the architecture and decorations of St. Louis Church. Buffalo, for which the organ is intended after it has served its purpose at the Exposition. An interesting fact in connection with this instrument is that it will be built in the city of Buffalo. The contract has been awarded to Emmons, Howard & Son, the well-known organ building firm, now of Westfield, Mass., but who have arranged to begin work in their new factory at Buffalo, and hence the organ which will be seen at the Exposition will be the first large organ manufactured in the city of Buffalo.

A Wonderful Organization.

Very few people realize the magnitude and scope of the Sunday-school work of this country and Canada. Through its various organizations over thirteen and a half millions of people are reached with the Word The International Convention. whose field covers the United States, Canada and Mexico, is the most comprehensive religious organization in the world, including as it does all denominations who work harmoniously together to save the children of the land. This association also has a worker io Japan. The work in the International Convention is carried on by two great committees, one the International Lesson Committee which select the Sunday-school lessons for the whole world and the International Executive Committee (of which B. F. Jacobs, Atwood Bldg., Chicago, Ill., is chairman), which has in charge the convention and field work, and all other general work. All but six states, territories and provinces are now organized into state or provincial associations, having in charge the Sunday-school work of their own state or province. Many states now have every county organized. The township organization is the one that reaches the individual schools, and comes in personal touch with the workers in these schools. Each township, county, state or province holds one or more conventions annually, aggregating many thousands in a year. The Sunday-school work, through the individual schools and the various organizations, is doing more for the cause of righteousness and good citizenship in our land than all other agencies combined.

The Prayer-Meeting.

A DISCIPLE.

The sanctuary of prayer is the sweet retreat of the Christian from the cares and anxieties of the day. Here he is privileged to hold communion with his Heavenly Father and to bear up before the throne of grace the interests and burdens of the church.

The true object before the prayer-meeting is, not only to receive strength and blessing to ourselves, but to remember in love and tender solicitude the church that is absent, whether in sickness, in labors or in waywardness. Would that each one could be taught to feel when Wednesday night comes that it is their privilege, if not necessarily occupied, to hasten away to the house of prayer, to pray for that part of the church that is busily engaged with the labors of life, that they may have strength, fortitude and fidelity from heaven. Then they who might be necessarily absent would be blessed when they remembered that while they waited and labored a part of the church was on its knees for them.

How constant the "faithful few" should be in prayer, because there are times when the entire interest and destiny of the church centers in their hearts. One time Christ took three men and withdrew to a hidden retreat in Gethsemane for prayer. They went there to bear on their hearts the great interests of the kingdom. This work fell to Christ and three men. But the three, failing to appreciate the deep import of the hour, slept! And the entire burden rested on the breaking heart of the Master. It seemed greater than he could bear. The destiny of the race hung in the balance. But he was constant and bore the burden for them and us. So, often yet the good of the church falls upon a few. Sometimes there is only one noble heart who sees and appreciates. And the great blessing of such a life is the being used of the Lord to bear, as he bore, the heavy cross.

And it is a sweet thought that comes to us while at prayer for the church that we are privileged to remember one another, even as Christ, our Mediator, pleads for us the mercy of God.

CHANGE OF ROUTE OF

ILLINOIS CENTRAL R. R.

The Illinois Central's Chicago-St. Louis line, over which the Daylight Special and the Diamond Special trains are run, has been changed between Clinton and East St. Louis, the new line now being from Clinton via Springfield and Litchfield instead of via Decatur and Pana as formerly. This is brought about by the recent acquisition by the Illinois Central Railroad Company of a portion of the St. Louis, Peoria & Northern Railway. It gives to the "Central" a first distance between Chicago and St. Louis, reduces the distance between Chicago and St. Louis, reduces the thirving State Capital of Illinois, on to a through main line. From Chicago to Clutton the line continues to be via Gilman, Gibson and Farmer City. On this line the "Daylight Special" has been newly and elegantly equipped, and has had added to "two new features of radical interest, namely; a

The Buffet-Library-Smoking Car has comfortable lounging chairs, a convenient and well-stocked buffet, a well selected library of the currect books of the day and files of the leading monthly and weekly periodicals, and a desk supplied with stationery and other facilities for writing. The dining car has a capacity of thirty at a sitting and takes the place of the Compartment-Cafe, and the Pullman-Buffet features previously maintained on this train. It is open for meals (served a la carte) during the entire run between St. Louis and Chicago.

New Local Line Between St. Louis and Freeport

A through coach is now run between St. Louis and Freeport in local trains leaving St. Louis and leaving Freeport, in the morning. This is a first-class line for such points in Northern Illinois as Bloomington, El Paso, Laisaile, Mendota, Forreston and Freeport and, as good consection is made by this through car at Freeport with the Central's through Limited trains to and from the west, it is also a first-class line for Galena, Dubuque and local points west in Iowa. Connection is also made north bound with trains for Munroe, Dodgeville and Madison, Wisconsin.

Full particulars concerning the above can be had any agent of the Illinois Central and connecting Care of Table Linens.

BY KENTUCKIENNE.

There is nothing that adds more to the attractiveness of a home than a table set with snowy white linens and pretty, dainty china and glassware. It does not take wealth to create refinement in a home, but it does take industry and an innate artistic love for the beautiful. A flower garden with blooming roses does not appeal to some housekeepers' taste to supply the table, and yet, it would only take a few moments to gather them and place them upon the table. It is a laudable ambition to wish to ornament and decorate one's home, and when we see a housewife combine the useful and beautiful we know she is a beneficent homemaker, for such things reform the children in a family. It is a great saving of table linens and the larger cloths to have the smaller pieces such as carving cloths, tea tray pieces, center squares and doylies. They not only ornament, but save wear and tear of the larger cloths, and also save the laundry bill, which is quite an item.

It soon wears out a cloth to have it laundered often, and these small pieces preserve it and save it from stains, such as fruit, coffee, etc. They can be made very simply of butcher's linen and neatly hemstitched, or a little embroidery, and they can be washed out every few days at home by putting them in a bowl of warm rainwater and add a little Pearline to cleanse them, and rinse in warm water and iron them on the wrong side while damp, and they will look as fresh and as new as possible.

It is a great saving all around to use them every day. By washing them yourself you need not have so many changes, and it will protect and keep your handsome damask linen table cloth clean twice as long, and I overlook mine every morning to see if there is any fruit stains, and if so I pour boiling water through the stain and remove it.

The fad of putting roseleaves between the table linens, towels, napkins and bed linens is a dainty idea; it gives them a delicate fragrance, and one can gather a quantity at home if they have roses.

Laborers as Investors.

During the present discussion of the enormous dividends paid by the Standard Oil Company, the Carnegie Steel Company, and other great corporations, a defender of such a state of things argued that the laboring man has no ground for complaint that his share of the profits is too small, since he invests nothing in the business. He takes no risks. He simply sells his labor at the lowest market price and is entitled to nothing

This may be true partially of the most unskilled labor, the man who can wheel a barrow of bricks just as readily as he can wheel a barrow of ore; or who, if he loses his job on the railroad track, can swing his pick just as well in the mines.

But all skilled labor does make an investment in the business in which it is engaged, and the skill of the artisan is just as essential in carrying on a manufacturing business as are the dollars of the capitalist.

The skilled laborer invests his intelligence, his training, and sometimes inherited qualities. The one chance of his life is his trade. He takes as great risks, proportionately, as the other. Overproduction, business panics, shut-downs from various causes, mean irreparable loss to him. The rolling-mill man has staked his all on mastering the work of the rolling-mill. He cannot recall his investment and go to work in a flour-mill or a carpenter shop. The fact that the precise amount of his investment cannot be as readily shown on a ledger page as that of a capitalist does not weaken his claim to an equitable share of the profits. It is to the interests of capital to set labor on as high a plane as possible. That is an ignoble and shortsighted view that makes of the working man a paid machine that gives its daily dole of labor in exchange for a bare living and is none the poorer. It stultifies and stunts manhood.

The view that every Christian should take of his work, however menial, is that he is putting himself into it-his intelligence, his conscience, his personal interest as well as his hands and tongue. An increase of wages may pay for increased efficiency, but it is not value in full for what the ambitious, conscientious, sober working man gives to the business. The money the capitalist invests derives a part of its value from the fact that the other man has invested the energies of his life in making the first investment profitable. The one is as much an investor in the business as the other, and has as good a claim to an equitable share in the profits.—Exchange.

Dowgate Snuff.

J. BRECKENRIDGE ELLIS.

I have been asked to give a sample program of the Advance Society. Here is one: The children meet on Friday evening after school or after supper. The secretary calls the roll and each member, when called, recites the quotation learned that week; if the society meets two times a month, the member recites both quotations, always giving the author. The president asks the secretary to read the minutes of the last meeting. After they are approved, the president asks all who have kept the five resolutions since last meeting to hold up their hands. If any one has failed the secretary makes note of the fact, to state it in the minutes. After these preliminaries, the one who has been selected reader for the evening reads a chapter out of a book which all have previously approved. No book should be taken which any one member has read, unless that member is perfectly willing to hear it a second time. The book might be Tom Sawyer, or Helen's Babies, or Jack and Jill, or our page in the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST, or anything you please. If thought best there may be two or three readers, to rest each other up, or the members may take turn about, or you may get some grown-up person who reads "real nice" to read for you, or you needn't have any reading at all. In short, you have met to have a good time, and you don't have to do anything but meet, have roll call as described and learn who has kept the resolutions and have the minutes read; but songs and speeches and essays are good. Mr. C. Dickens says:

If the confession that I have often traveled from my lodging on Sundays should give offense to those who never travel on Sundays, they will be satisfied (I hope) by my adding that the journeys in question were made to churches. It is my first experiment and I have come to the region of Whittington in an omnibus. So many bells are ringing when I stand undecided on a street corner that every sheep in the ecclesiastical fold might be a bellwether. My indecision is divided between four great churches, all within sight and sound. I don't see as many as four people going at once, though I see four churches clamoring for people. I choose my church and go to the great entrance in the tower. A rope comes through the roof of the moldy tower and a man pulls it and clashes the bell; a whitey-brown man, whose clothes were once black, a man with flue on him, cobweb. I peep into the dim church; about twenty people are waiting to begin. I open the door of a family pew and shut myself in; if I could occupy twenty family pews I might have them. The clerk looks at me as who should say: "You have done it now!" Organ plays; choir, two girls. I wonder within myself what will happen when we are required to sing. There is a pale heap of books in the corner of my pew that belonged, in 1754, to the Dowgate family. And who were they? Perhaps a young Dowgate in the flush of youthful hope had at that rickety altar married; and perhaps it had not turned out in the long run as great a success as he expected?

The opening of the service recalls my wandering thoughts. I then find, to my astonishment, that I am taking a strong kind of invisible snuff to my nose. I wink, sneeze and cough. The clerk sneezes; the clergyman winks; all our little party wink, sneeze and cough. The snuff is made of the decay of matting, wood and earth, and of something else-the decay of dead citizens in the vaults below. Not only do we cough and sneeze dead citizens all through the service, but dead citizens have got into the very bellows of the organ, and half cocked the same. We stamp our feet to warm them and dead citizens arise in heavy clouds. In this first experience I was so nauseated by too much snuff made of the Dowgate family and other families and branches, that I gave but little heed to our dull manner of ambling through the service; to the clerk's encouraging us to try a note or two; to the choir's enjoying a shrill duet with no idea of time or tune; to the whitey-brown man's manner of shutting up the minister in the pulpit, and being very particular with the lock of the door, as if he were a dangerous

Another Sunday. After being rung for by conflicting bells, like a leg of mutton, I select a smaller church than the first. As a congregation we are 14 strong, not counting an exhausted charity school of four boys and and two girls. We are so quiet in our dullness that three boys who have got away into a corner, give us a start like crackers whenever they snigger. An aunt and her nephew are much disturbed by the sniggering boys. The nephew is himself a boy and the sniggerers tempt him with secular thoughts of marbles and string, by secretly offering such commodities to his distant contemplation. The nephew for a while resists, but presently becomes a backslider and in dumb show defies the sniggerers to heave a marble in his direction. Herein he is detected by his aunt and I perceive that worthy relative to poke him in the side with the hooked handle of an ancient umbrella. The nephew revenges himself by holding his breath and terrifying his kinswoman with the dread belief that he has made up his mind to burst. Regardless of whispers and shakes, he swells and becomes discolored, until the aunt can bear it no longer, but leads him out with no visible neck and with his eyes going before him like a prawn's. This causes the sniggerers to regard flight as an eligible move, and I know which will go first because of the overdevout attention he suddenly pays the clergyman. In a little while this hypocrite with a face expressive of having until now forgotten a religious appointment elsewhere, is gone. Number two with an elaborate demonstration of hushing his footsteps, gets out in the same way. Number, three getting safely to the door, there turns reckless, bangs it opens and flies out with a whoop! that vibrates to the top of the tower above us. The clergyman only glances up, as having an idea that somebody has said amen in the wrong place, then continues his steady jog-trot like a farmer's wife going to market. His drowsy cadance soon lulls three old women to sleep and two lovers sit looking at each other so happy that I mind when I turned of eighteen went with my Angelica to a church on account of a shower, and when I said to my Angelica: "Let the blessed event, Angelica, occur at no alter but this!" and when my Angelica consented that it should occur at no otherwhich it certainly never .did, for it never occurred anywhere. And O, Angelica, what has become of you this present Sunday morning, when I can't attend to the sermon? And more difficult question than that, What has become of me as I was when I sat by your side?

DRUNKENNESS CURED.

An eminent St. Louis physician has given a port tive answer to the oft asked question, is drunk enness a disease, or is it simply a temptation that cannot be resisted by a vast number of the human The physician in question is Dr. Ozias Paquin, who for years has been a practicing physician in the City of St. Louis. He has answered this question by taking five of the worst drunkards that could be found and cured them of all further appetite for intoxicating drinks. The five cases were all beyond middle age and they had sunk into the deepest pit of drunkenness, with the odor of drink about them so obnoxious that it was almost impossible to stand within speaking distance. He not only cured them of all desire for intoxicating drink, but at the same time placed upon their cheek the flush of healtn and into their eyes the light of happiness, and took from their person the odor of whiskey. It was almost a miracle, for he had raised five cases from degradation into the sunshine of health and happiness. Dr. Paquin has cured hundreds of patients who were relapses from other treatments, and in every instance he cured these patients, and they have remained cured for months and years. It can therefore be said that the Paquin Treatment is a permanent cure, and not a temporary one, for the patient never relapses to his former condition. We know of no more humane work being done at the present time than that which Dr. Paquin is doing, and it is the duty of every reader to assist Dr. Ozias Paquin in his noble work, and if any reader has brother, sister, husband, father or friend in whose system lurks the disease of drunkenness, he shou'd at once send their name to Dr. Paquin or see that they either visit or place themselves in communication with the Ozias Paquin Immune Co., Suite 1113 Chemical Bidg., St. Louis. The reader that does this will certainly be doing a christian act, for no matter how hopeless the case may seem, and no matter how many other treatments have unsuccessfully been tried, the method known as Ozias Paquin Treatment will perfect a cure, dispelling all destire for drink, and at the same time will place the constitution in a robust and healthy condition. whiskey. It was almost a miracle, for he had raised

W. F. RICHARDSON.

THE GENTILE WOMAN'S FAITH.

After the discourse of Jesus in Capernaum in which he called himself the Bread of Life, we are told that many of those who had been following him turned away, unable to receive the high truths he brought to replace their low and unworthy conceptions of the kingdom of heaven. In sadness Jesus asked the Twelve: "Will ye also go away?" Simon Peter, ever ready to lead his comrades in confession, answered: "Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life. And we have believed and know that thou art the Holy One of God." Blessed trust, which held the souls of the chosen ones steady through the storm of doubt that surged about the person of this mysterious Man of Nazareth!

Encouraged by the defection in the ranks of Jesus' followers, the Pharisees and scribes, who had come from Jerusalem to oppose his growing power, found opportunity of caviling in the neglect on the part of the Master and his disciples to observe one of the rigid customs of the formalists in Judaism. Careless as they were concerning purity of heart and holiness of life, the Pharisees and scribes were punctilious in the extreme in observing all the various washings enjoined by their customs and traditions. The hands must be washed before every meal, and only in a certain way. To pour water over the hands in any other fashion than the one specifically enjoined, was to make the act a sin rather than a meritorious deed. Jesus boldly ignored this custom and sat down with his disciples without paying any attention to this for-To him no washing was of value except as there was uncleanness to be removed, and the heart needed far more the purifying tears of repentance than did the hands the formal application of water. To the captious question: "Why do thy disciples transgress the tradition of the elders?" Jesus made the stinging reply: "Why do ye also transgress the commandment of God because of your tradition?" The discourse that followed served to advertise to the whole nation the revolutionary nature of the truth he came to proclaim. All the subtle refinements they had heaped upon the Word of Godserved but to hide from the people its true meaning and to afford a way of escape from its holy and beneficent obligations. To lay the emphasis of life upon its external ceremonies rather than upon its spiritual principles was to misunderstand and misapply the whole revelation God had given to man. Not what went into the stomach, in the form of food, determined character, but what was in the heart, our thoughts, our emotions, our purposes-these marked us as good or evil. And the outflowings of these in speech and conduct became the true index of one's standing before God.

This discourse aroused such violent animosity on the part of the public teachers at whom it was simed that Jesus found it needful to leave Galilee for a season; and he turned his steps toward the borders of Tyre and Sidon, on the west of Galilee, his first entry into distinctively heathen territory. Phœnicia was inhabited by a people akin to the ancient Canaanites, whose base idolatry had sunken them to depths below the level of the surrounding nations. It might seem strange that Jesus would hope to find any place of resting among a people so alien to the Jewish nation and religion; but he doubtless remembered how that God's prophet had been given a home in the humble dwelling of the widow of Sarepta, and he hoped to find some other heart equally ready to succor him who came in the name of Jehovah. Such a home he found, but the name of his host is not revealed. It may have been some dweller in this land who had heard the Master preach and witnessed some of his miracles while passing through Galilee. Here Jesus would have hidden himself from the public and found that rest which he so sadly needed. But Mark tells us that "he could not be hid." No, the Christ could never hide himself. His blessed light could not be quenched. even by the clouds of human doubt, and the murky fog of sin. Nor has the world yet been able to hide his glory so that it should not shine out on the path of men. Christ cannot be hidden in human history, even though it be written by such sceptics as Hume and Gibbon. His footsteps are heard through every century. Neither can he be hidden in our hearts, if we are his disciples. If the Rose of Sharon is blooming in the garden of our souls its perfume will fill all the atmosphere in which we move. If we can keep our religion to ourselves we have a religion that is not worth keeping. A church that is satisfied with its own salvation is itself unsaved. For such a church God has no use, the world no respect and the devil no fear.

We are told of but one incident of his ministry among these alien people. A Greek or Gentile woman of Canaanitish or Syrophænician blood came to him beseeching mercy for her daughter who was afflicted with a demon. Matthew tells us that at first Jesus made no answer, and that the disciples requested him to send her away when she followed and persisted in her plea. Seeming to share in their feeling of unworthiness, the Master turned to her and said: "I was not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel." Had the woman's faith been other than it was, strong and implicit, this saying would have discouraged her and perhaps prevented further petition. But in that event Jesus would not have given the apparent rebuff, for we cannot for a moment believe that he ever intended to turn her away unblessed. This would be to give the lie to all his ministry of mercy. His purpose was to draw forth such expression of her faith as should be an object-lesson to his disciples, and should fully justify to Isreal the healing of a heathen. To his declaration, therefore, the poor woman responded by falling at his feet in the attitude of worship and crying out: "Lord, help me!" She had some idea of Jesus' claims to be the Messiah, it is likely, since at the first, according to Matthew, she addressed him as the Son of David. Then there fell from Jesus' lips what seems like the only heartless expression to whichhe ever gave utterance: "Let the children first be filled; for it is not meet to take the children's bread and cast it to the dogs." Had these words expressed the real feeling of Jesus he would have given a serious blow to the respect and affection with which the human race has ever regarded him. To look on any needy creature as no more worthy than a dog of the streets would be to advertise one's innate ignorance and selfishness. But we now know that Jesus said this to prove to his disciples the marvelous faith of this despised heathen woman. Had her faith been like the bruised reed rather than like the mighty oak he would not have subjected it to this test, that would have surely broken it. The smoking flax he would not have quenched; but the strong, clear flame of such faith as hers could not be quenched by even so harsh a reply as that he gave her.

Nobly did her faith rise to the occasion. Boldly did she turn the figure used to refuse a favor, as she thought, into the service of her petition: "Yea, Lord; even the dogs under the table eat of the children's crumbs." I know I am not of the chosen people. I am conscious of my own unworthiness to share in the first gifts of mercy. But you have long been feeding the children of Israel with the loaves of divine bounty. So many of their afflicted have you loosed from the bonds of suffering that you may surely now vouchsafe to even a heathen dog, as we are called by the Jews, this single act of mercy. Let me, poor unworthy me, have this crumb of grace for my unfortunate child!

The lesson is complete. Henceforth the disciples of Jesus can point to this marvelous expression of faith as evidence that the great heathen world is not wholly unready for the gospel. Their narrowness and bigotry are sufficiently rebuked for the present. Jesus gives glad utterance to the words of grace that have been pressing for expression every moment since this widow's first appeal fell on his ears. He now answers her prayer with the gracious words: "O, woman, great is thy faith; be it done unto thee even as thou wilt." He also said: "For this saying go thy way; the devil is gone out of thy daughter." And with the same unquestioning confidence that had moved her to come and ask, and to stay and plead, she at once turns away and hastens home, fully assured that the word of the Master will prove true, and she will find her dear child well again. O, that we might have such faith as hers, and then would our petitions find ready answer at the hands of the dear Lord, who waits to bless, and tenderly invites us to ask.

Deafness Cannot Be Cured

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure Deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets imflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed for ever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

TOPIC FOR JULY 15.

HOW MISSION WORK WILL GAIN SUCCESS.

(Acts 1:6-14.)

This ambiguously worded topic is open to various interpretations. If it means, How will mission work be successful? we may reply-

Missions will gain success first, by being true to the spirit of our Lord Christ. If we go to the ends of the earth with his gentle, kindly spirit, we shall win men and women for his kingdom. If, however, we go with any arrogance, hardness or intolearance toward the heathen and toward their view of things we shall drive them, as the Pharisees drove men, from the kingdom of God. It is gentleness and winning good humor which, next to valor, men admire. It is the life that is suspended on the cross of self-forgetfulness that draws all men into it.

Again, in mission work, to gain success we must plunge in in earnest, as we do after success in other business. The men who win in the commercial world are those who go in to win. We must throw our souls-and our pocketbooks-into the balance, organize thoroughly and otherwise employ earnest business methods.

Yet again, success will follow only after patience. "Witnesses unto me, both in Jerusalem," then wider, "in all Judea," then wider still, "to the uttermost parts of the earth." What a world of patient endeavor is wrapped up in these short utterances; what days and years, yea, even centuries of toil and waiting! Not in a few short months shall the great successes of missions be accomplished. Carey toiled many years without a convert; Judson, too; Morrison, too. The records of missions have been one long story of unremitting toil and patient waiting for fruits. Why, then, should we be discouraged when additions do not quickly come to our church, or our C. E. Society, or our mission? Go ye forth with weeping, bearing precious seed, and we shall doubtless come again rejoicing.

But if we decide that our subject means, How does mission work bring success to the general efforts for Christianity? we open up the large theme of the reaction of missions upon the church

Every one is acquainted with instances of such reaction, instances in which a church has invested in the distant work only to double or treble its returns at home. When Dr. Noble was called to his church in Chicago, years ago, he found it many thoasands of dollars in debt. When the day for the foreign offering came round he astonished his people by giving them a week's notice that he wanted $500 for Foreign Missions. They were too astonished to remonstrate. When the Sunday came the offering, much to the surprise of all, was $800; and in a few years' time the heavy mortgage was lifted and the church was giving ten thousand a year for missions. Such, in a smaller way, is the record of many another congregation. The church that is liberal towards missions is successful in its own affairs.

It was when the little company of disciples at Jerusalem began to obey the mandate, witness in all the world-nay, when the church was compelled by scattering persecution to obey that mandate- -it was then that its own numbers went far beyond the 120 or even the three thousand. There is that scattereth and yet increaseth; there is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty.

Anti-missionary churches are anti-success churches. Anti-ism and failure go hand in hand. They are sisters both, and they both are hardshells. They go as fast as snails and are as good companions as snappingturtles. The Baptists divided about equally years ago on missions. Today the Missionary Baptists have grown to a gigantic religious body, while the anti-m'ssionaries or Hardshells, are scarce as birds of paradise.

Literature

JULY MAGAZINES.

The July Woman's Home Companion has many attractions that stamp it as one of the finest issues of the year. In this number begins what promises to be one of the leading novels of the fall, "The Plutocrats," by Francis Lynde, a love story of a decidedly original type. The leading article discusses "Paris Memories of Franklin and Lafayette," in which Edward Page Gaston refers to the greatest international event of the Exposition, the unveiling of the statute of Lafayette on on the Fourth of July. The article is full of color and finely illustrated.

In the July Atlantic ex-President Cleveland concludes his argument for The Independence of the Executive with a striking account of his own long and bitter struggle with Congress, which arose from the famous Tenure of Office Act, and resulted in a vindication of Pres. Cleveland's position and the repeal of the act itself.

The July number of Frank Leslie's popular Monthly is appropriately patriotic, in grouping together the Hon. John Quincy Adam's illustrated article upon "The Birthplace of the American Flag," Hezekiah Butterworth's inspiring "Flag Song," specially revised and extended for this publication, and a fine poem by Theodora Peck, entitled "A Dream of the Flag."

The timeliness of the July Century is due in large measure to its literary and pictorial treatment of the present Mecca of holiday-makers. Eight full-page drawings by Castaigne illustrate the Exposition; and four other full-page and several smaller drawings from the same pencil form a pictorial commentary on Richard Whiteing's paper on "Artistic Paris." Having begun life as an artist, Mr. Whiteing writes with keen appreciation of his subject; in a style, moreover, that has many of the qualities distinctive of the French man-of-letters.

The ever-glorious Fourth was not forgotten when the editor of St. Nicholas "made up" the July number of that magazine for the young. "The Battle of Santiago" (July 3, 1898,) is the frontispiece. It illustrates a paper by Miss Jessie Peabody Frothingham, in which are chronicled "Some Great Sea Fights," beginning with Manila and Santiago and going back thence to the first great event in naval warfare, the battle of Salamis, and coming down chronologically, but by leaps and bounds, to Actium, Lepanto, Armada, the Anglo-Dutch fight on the Downs in 1666, Trafalgar and Mobile Bay.

ATWATER.

We gave a good picture of our deceased brother, John Milton Atwater, on our first page, recently. He was a pure, clean man. who loved truth, loved God, loved men, served his generation with untiring labors, as the following record will show, and has gone to the reward of the righteons. John Milton Atwater was born at Mantua, Ohio,

After the Philadelphia Centennial he again turned his face to the West; was pastor at Wauseon, O., 1876-8; pastor at Springfield, Ill, 1878-9; pastor at Cleveland, Franklin Circle Church, 1879-84. Here, for the benefit of his own Sunday-school and a few others he published the "Multum in Parvo" lesson leaf. which was regarded as a great help by teachers. In the second year of his pastorate he went to Hiram and took President B. A. Hinsdale's place in the college while he spent several weeks (in fall of 1880) campaigning for Garfield, with great Joseph King, at Allegheny, Pa., spring of 1884 to the fall of the same year; was pastor at Ada, O. (seat of the Normal School), 1885-7, and spent a part of the time with the church at Lima, O. Here, at Ada, he began publishing The One Principle a monthly payablet which we introduced to Here, at Ada, he began publishing The One Principle, a monthly pamphlet, which was intended to emphasize the importance of the union of all Christians upon Christ. This he continued from July 1886 to July 1887. He was next chosen (Sept. 1887) head of the Normal Department and Professor of Didactics in Garfield University, Wichita, Kan., under the presidency of H. W. Everest. The university was a fine success till its finances failed. His wife died at Wichita, Sept. 9, 1887. He preached in several Kansas churches 1888 to '90. Was professor of Latin, Eureka College, Ill., 1891-2. He was married to Miss College, Ill., 1891-2. He was married to Miss Anna Robison, June, 1892. While about to enter upon his second year at Eureka he was chosen president of Oskaloosa College, Iowa. Here he and his efficient wife, who greatly endeared herself to Iowa people, did hard and successful work, 1892 to 1897. He was next elected president of Central Christian College, Albany, Mo. The failure of his health soon after reaching his new field practically terminated his life labors and caused his resignation at the close of the and caused his resignation at the close of the college year. He preached only occasionally after that where he and his wife happened to be staying—at Winston, N. C., at Bedford, O., Cleveland, both at the Euclid Avenue and Franklin Circle Churches. He died January 17, 1900, among the people of his pastorate of 1884.

DAVIS.

William A. Davis was born Sept. 16, 1827, and died June 4, 1900, aged 72 years 8 months and 9 days. He was married June 15, 1848, to the faithful companion who is left to mourn his departure. He united with the courch about thirty years ago, since which he had enjoyed an active and blessed fellowship with Christ. Bro. Davis had been an elder in the church at Ash, Mo., ever since the organization of that congregation. leaves seven sons and three daughters—all grown—to lament the loss of a devoted father. His funeral, attended by a large concourse of his friends and neighbors and an only brother, was conducted by the writer.

GINGRICH.

Will Gingrich, one of our best young men in the church here, was drowned in the Neosho River June 6. Our Sunday-school was having a picnic, and Will with another young man had gone in bathing, and while in midstream Bro. Will was suddenly taken with cramps and was drowned before help could reach him. He was 19 years old and was loved and respected by all who knew him. The sorrowing family have the sympathy of the entire community. Services were conducted by the writer June 8, the A. O. U. W. assisting.

ICE.

Mrs. Lou Paulsell Ice departed this life May 11, 1900, at Lawrence, Kan. On Aug. 2, 1898, the writer went to Downey, Cal., to perform the marriage ceremony for Miss Paulsell and Bro. Alva E. Ice. At that time Bro. Ice was pastor of the Christian Church of Downey. Immediately after their marriage Bro. and Sister Ice, amidst the congratulations of a host of friends and wellwishers, left Downey, the home of Sister Ice from her early childhood, and still the home of her eisters, who are so well known in the community and so much beloved for their work's sake. and so much beloved for their works sake. The body, accompanied by Bro. Ice, was brought back to Downey for burial. The entire community was profoundly moved with sympathy for those so suddenly and so sadly bereaved. They sorrow not even as others who have no hope, for they believe that Jesus died and rose again, and that them that sleep in Jesus will god bring with him. They comfort one another with these words.

MOORE.

Bro. Jacob Moore, one of the oldest settlers in Cedar County, Iowa, died at his home, near Bennett, May 8, 1900. He was born in Roanoke County, Virginia, Dec. 10, 1819 At the age of four years he moved with his parents to Greene County, Indiana. This was his home for many years. It was here he married Miss Rebecca Sparks Dec. 8, 1842. Five children were born to them two of whom survive with the mother, widowed after nearly sixty years of married life. Jacob Moore entered the land on which he lived until his death Oct. 13, 1852. He moved his family to it in 1855 and the widow still clings to the old home. He received the deed di-rect from the United States Government, and it eemains in his name to this day. No lien or mort-gage was ever recorded against it, a fact in which the owner took much pride. He had a horror of debt of any kind, and in this he had the full sympathy and hearty co-operation of his wife. They made it a rule to do without what they could not pay for at the time. Both Bro. Moore and his wife united with the Christian Church in early life and were always earnest and consistent members, maintaining a spotless reputation and honored by all who knew them for unswerving integrity. Careful and prudent in all his dealings, in-dustrious, patient and far-seeing, he accumulated quite a large estate, sufficient to provide the wid-ow with a bountiful support as long as she lives and to leave the children well provided for. While careful and economical in financial matters, he was generous to the church and our colleges. He was a friend and helper of Oskaloosa College and sent his son there. It was the writer's privilege, two years ago, to visit the home in the interest of Drake University. It required no coaxing to secure his aid. A plain statement of the condition of affairs was enough. He was happy in his benefactions. The long and peaceful life of himself and companion is a beautiful commentary on the power of the Christian religion to tless a home and through it bless the community and the state. The son lives in Idaho and the daughter, Mrs. Goddard, in Davenport, Iowa.

MAJOR.

Bro. Henry A. Major, a near relative of the writer, was born in Lafayette County, Mo., Oct. 26, 1858 He was baptized early in life by Bro. C. A. Hedrick; studied for the ministry, in which occupation he grew to be most highly esteemed for his ability and consecration. For many years he has labored faithfully among the churches of Texas, attending the lectureships and state conventions, from which he will be sadly missed in the future. His remains were tak-n from Brownthe future. His remains were tak-n from Brown-wood to Bowie, Tex., and on May 12 were laid to rest in 'the beautiful cemetery waere he had once been pastor, and beside the father of his devoted wife. Bro. Henry was the son of Capt. W. Boon Major, who did valuable service in the Mexican War, and also in that of the Confederacy, and who now lives near Miami, Mo. May God comfort the hearts that mourn, and be e-pecially near to the longly wife and three bright little children. the hearts that mouth, and he especially hear to the lonely wife and three bright little children. IT IS A STRANGE fact that young men are so much more careful about whom they go with than young ladies. A young lady will go with a young man who drinks or swears orlis living any kind of wrong life, but you will not find many young men who will go with young ladies who are doing any of those things. Young ladies have a great field in this for doing good, if they would use it.

Book Notes.

"On the Rock," cloth edition, for seventy-five cents! That is the latest half price offer we are making. The book has always sold for $1.50, and is well worth that price. No book in all the literature of the Disciples of Christ has had so large a reading. This edition that we are closing out is the twenty-eighth. Remember that there is a condition attached to this offer, and that is that your order must reach us before July 23. This time limit is absolute, and no orders will be filled at this price after that date. This is your last and only chance to obtain a copy of this standard work at so low a price. Send us your order immediately.

Many churches and Sunday-schools are inadequately supplied with song-books because they feel poor, and unable to invest $50 or $75 in a full supply of books. We have lately issued a new book, "Tidings of Salvation," designed to meet just such cases. It contains one hundred and seventeen of the finest gospel hymns and standard songs, by the best authors and composers, and can be bought, in manila binding, for Ten Dollars per Hundred, or Fifty for Five Dollars! Understand that this is the music edition. There is nothing cheap about the book but the price. The book contains no trash, but only the very best music. The price of a single copy, postpaid, is fifteen cents. Send for a copy, and be convinced that you can really secure a book of first-class, serviceable music at an exceedingly low figure.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The National Convention of the Prohibi tion party, recently held in Chicago, placed in nomination for President the Hon. John G. Woolley, of Chicago, and for Vice-President, the Hon. H. B. Metcalf, of Rhode Island. President McKinley was severely condemned for his attitude on the "army canteen" question. Mr. Woolley was nominated on the first ballot. The convention is said to have been the largest and the most enthusiastic ever held by the party, and the delegates were universally hopeful of large gains in the coming election. They have placed a strong and popular man at the head of their ticket, and are prepared to make a vigorous campaign. Concerning Mr. Woolley's running mate the Chicago Record says:

Henry B. Metcalf was born in Boston in 1829, and was educated in the public schools of that city. His home is in Pawtucket, R. I., where he is president of the Providence County Savings Bank. He has been a candilate for governor of his state on the Prohibition ticket several times, and was formerly a Republican state senator. He is president of the board of trustees of Tufts College, Rhode Island. He has a wife and only son.

There is no reason, therefore, why the Prohibition party should not poll the largest vote in its history.

The cloud of darkness and desperation which has so long surrounded Pekin, China, has not lifted nor broken. Enough information has leaked out, however, to know that events of the most tragic character have been transpiring within her gates during the last month. Not only is it now certain that the German Minister, Baron von Ketteler, has been killed, but it is generally believed that a similar fate has overtaken all of the ministers, the missionaries, the foreigners and thousands of native Christians. The legations are probably all destroyed and a large part of the city reported burned. Some time during the month of June Prince Tuan, the leader of the Boxers' anti-foreign movement, usurped the throne of China, caused the Emperor and the Empress Dowager to seek death at their own bands by drinking poison, and began his awful work of exterminating foreigners. A large army was placed at his command within and without the walls of Pekin, and since that time it has been impossible to succor those imprisoned there or even to learn of their fate. Edicts of extermination of foreigners were sent to other cities by this usurper and murderer, and while the uprising is extending, it is not believed that Southern China will recognize his authority. In the meantime the battle at Tien Tsin continues, with unknown results other than the inability of the powers with their present forces to more than defend themselves until greatly re-enforced. The situation on the whole is of the most alarming and distressing character.

It will be remembered by our readers that the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST called attention to the impending danger to our ministers, to our missionaries and to the native Christian population of China before this outbreak occurred, in connection with a comment upon a letter from Mr. Timothy Richards, whose chief mission to this country and to the Ecumenical Conference was to arouse the American people to the real situation there. We have refused to take the optimistic view that many of the London and Washington dispatches have taken of this outbreak in China. It has seemed to us from the very beginning the opening up of a new chapter in China's history, but an opening that was to be accompanied with revolution and an appalling loss of life. The gravity of the situation is intensified by the fact that the present dictator, Prince Tuan, while having a certain legal claim to the throne, being a son of the late Emperor, Hien Feng, is an avowed enemy to all foreigners and foreign innovations. To allow his revolution to succeed and to permit him to rule the destiny of China would be to undo all the work of Christian civilization that has been wrought in China during the present century. It is evident that the nations of Europe, together with the United States, have a most difficult problem to deal with, and it remains to be seen whether they will deal with it in a spirit of magnanimity and of justice. Let us hope that the Anglo-Saxon nations at least will stand together in demanding that whatever is done be done for the good of China and of Christian civilization, and free from the motive of territorial aggrandizement. Our government has already signified its willingness to bear its part in restoring order in China and protecting the lives and property of its citizens, and its opposition to any territorial division.

Notwithstanding a fight in the committee room over the silver plank in the national platform of the Demoaratic party at Kansas City last week, the end was unity and the convention harmonious in its conclusions. William Jennings Bryan, of Nebraska, and Adlai E. Stevenson, of Illinois, were placed in nomination for President and Vice-President on the first ballot for each office. David B. Hill was placed in nomination by New York and doubtless could have secured the nomination, but he refused to accept it and the convention unaminously turned to Stevenson. The Silver Republicans followed this action of the Democratic Convention and notwithstanding their previous declarations for Towne, accepted Stevenson and placed him in nomination with Bryan on their ticket. It is now thought that Towne will withdraw from the Populist party and allow them to substitute the name of Stevenson, so that Bryan and Stevenson will head three of the national tickets in the coming election, the Democratic, the Silver Republican and the Populist. The fight over the silver plank in the Democratic resolutions committee was whether the ratio statement of 16 to 1 should be incorporated and carried by two votes. The vote stood 26 for and 24 against the ratio statement. The concurrent admission of the committee, however, that the primary plank of the platform and issue of the campaign is "Imperialism" pleased everybody and brought about the harmony of the convention. The platform is both explicit and strong! from a Democratic view-point and seems to be satisfactory to almost the entire body of the party East, West, North and South. The harmonious issue of the convention will greatly strengthen the party in the present campaign.

The National Democratic Convention which met in Kansas City last week accomplished what was expected of it in the unanimous nomination of W. J. Bryan for President. It was not known until the gathering of the convention who would be the running mate of the distinguished Nebraskan. Several names had been mentioned, but 'least prominent among these was the one nominated, Adlai Steve son, of Illinois. Mr. Stevenson, it will be remembered, was Vice-President with Mr. Cleveland. The chief discussion was not concerning the candidates, but concerning the platform, and this discussion was not on the floor of the convention, but in the committee room. The point at issue was whether to simply reaffirm the Chicago platform, including its financial plank, or to specifically reaffirm that plank, including the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1. A majority of the delegates were in favor of a simple reaffirmation of the Chicago platform, but Mr. Bryan held out for a distinct declaration of the identical proposition which constituted the issue in the campaign of 1896. No amount of testimony as to the number of votes it would cost him to redeclare this issue swerved him a hair's breadth, and his steadfastness brought the convention to his position, and the financial theory of the Chicago platform was especially reaffirmed. The other planks in the platform referred to are "imperialism," "private monopolies" or "trusts," "government by injunction," a declaration in favor of the Nicaragua Canal and the repeal of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, an amendment to the constitution providing for the election of United States senators by direct vote of the people and direct legislation wherever practicable. The opponents of the 16-to-1 plank were placated by making "imperialism" the "paramount issue." There were the usual scenes of enthusiasm enacted in connection with the platform and the candidates. Senator Hill, representing New York and the East, pledged the support of the Democrats of that section to the Kansas City platform and ticket. The new convention hall in Kansas City in which the convention was held received many tributes of praise for its acoustic properties and other excellencies, and the people of Kansas City were extolled for their hosp tality.

On the 2nd day of July articles of agreement between the St. Louis Transit Co. and their ex-employees were signed, thus bringing to an end their long and costly controversy. The settlement was effected by direct agreement and came in the nature of a happy surprise to everybody. The parties principally instrumental in getting the officials of the company and those of the strikers together were Rev. Dr. Boyd, pastor of the Second Baptist Church, of this city, and Attorney Faulk. The agreement was signed late on Monday evening and ratified by the strikers on Tuesday afternoon. That the agreement was a fair one to each party in the controversy is generally agreed, and confirmed by the absence of any serious complaining or undue boasting by either party. The agreement includes all that was claimed by the men as to pay and hours of service in the March contract and an agreement on the part of the company to employ all its men hereafter needed from the strikers not guilty of disorderly and unlawful conduct during the strike until all such of their number shall have been re-employed. As soon as the agreement was signed by the president of the Transit Co. and the chairman of the grievance committee the strike was declared off, the boycot on the company's cars lifted and the city put to rest as to safety and convenience of travel. This has closed one of the most bitter industrial upheavals in the history of the city, and it is to be hoped that this costly lesson will not be without its wholesome effect upon both employers and employees.

Since reporting the settlement of the strike we regret to announce, as we go to press, that the agreement is declared void and the strike renewed. The men claim that the Transit Co. has not lived up to the agreement made in the re-employment of the men and refuse to return to work under the agreement. The Transit Co., upon the other hand, claims that it has not broken the contract, and so the breach is as great as before the settlement. The strike does not affect the running of the cars, but will, as before, be continued in the form of a boycott upon the company. The action of the men in declaring the strike on again has been upheld by a committee of the Central Trades Union and the unions will renew their allegiance to the strikers and the war go on to its bitter end.

Every fresh cable dispatch from China only adds to the gravity of the situation in that country. It now appears that a revolution has occurred at Pekin, that Prince Tuan has deposed the Dowager Empress and her step-son, Kwang Su, and has assumed the role of dictator. It is he who has been waging war against the foreigners and opposing the allied forces of the nations which have been seeking to relieve the ministers at Pekin. There is at this writing scarcely a shred of hope that the foreign population in Pekin, including the foreign ministers, are alive, and even if alive at present. it is almost hoping against hope that they can survive until the allied armies can reach Pekin. Jealousy among the European nations adds materially to the difficulty of the situation. Japan has a lage army ready to advance at once to the relief of the ministers, but Russia, which, no doubt, has sinister motives in China, objects to this preponderance of Japanese military force in China, and Germany, it is said, sustains Russia in this objection. This intrusion of selfish motives when the lives of hundreds, not to say thousands, of foreigners are at stake, is disgraceful in the highest degree to the nations which manifest it It is no time to think of territorial conquests when the lives of our ministers and their families, of our missionories, of women and innocent children, are hanging as it were on a thread. Every consideration of honor and of humanity should prompt the Christian nations whose citizens are in China to concentrate at the earliest possible moment a sufficient force, no matter from what nation, to go to the rescue of their in periled citizens in Pekin and Tien Tsin. When this is done it will be time enough to consider the future of China.

The following paragraph from an article in the Columbia Herald on "The Rights of the Audience" may well be studied by preachers. Though not written for their distinctive benefit it deals with vital elements in successful oratory:

The audience has the right to hiss and the right to hear. It also has to right to hear some-thing. The obligation upon the speaker is greater than upon the writer. The reading audience may lay aside the book or magazine or newspaper or may skim or skip that which it does not care to read. The hearing audience must hear all. Only between acts can it go out. The speaker wrongs his audience when he serves up cheap and ill-pre-pared food. He wrongs himself as well. The first requisite-indeed the only requisite-for successful public speaking is to have something really With that once possessed all else worth saving. is comparatively easy. The gift of the gab brings laziness as its companion. All preachers, orators, public speakers of every kind are apt to rely too much upon the inspiration of the moment and the looseness and limberness of their tongues. Preparation is overlooked. But even the goods-box orator needs to think in advance. The white heat of public discussion will bring out illustrations, smiles, arguments, buried in memory's vault. Yet, unless they had previously been stored there, no matter what the heat, they would not be forthcoming. Nor can the speaker look down upon any audience. Listening is the highest compliment one man can pay another. To have several at one time listen is an accumulated compliment. Simple courtesy would demand in return something worth hearing.

THE VALUE OF MOTIVE IN THE TEACHING OF JESUS.

There is nothing more characteristic in the teaching of Jesus than His method of tracing all action back to its source in the huma heart. The teachers of His day looked upon the surface, at what was open and manifest, but He, on the contrary, probed into the secret motives of the heart, and found there the source of all actions, good and bad. The righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees was largely a matter of external forms and ceremonies and punctiliousness and scrupulosity in the observance of traditions and customs, but Jesus told His disciples that unless their righteousness exceeded the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees they should in nowise enter into the kingdom of God. By that He meant that their righteousness should consist in purity of heart, in right motives and purposes; in other words, in a righteous character.

According to the teaching of Jesus sin is a thing of the heart. He who hates his brother is a murderer, and he who looks upon a woman to lust after her is an adulterer. It does not require the formal disobedience in either case to make one a murderer or an adulterer. This is the chief distinction between divine and human law. The latter must deal with overt acts; the former deals with the motives and purposes of the heart. Not that human law does not seek to know the motives which prompt a crime, as for instance the taking of human life, in order to determine the proper degree of punishment, but it does not and in the nature of things cannot call that crime which exists only in thought, desire or purpose. It must wait on overt acts. But God knows the heart as no human judge or jury can know it, and He is able to trace sin to its hiding-place in the heart, where it really and potentially exists before it manifests itself by any outward act.

So far have human law and the sense of justice been affected by Christ's method of tracing crime to its source that no one thinks of regarding that man as a murderer who kills his fellowman by accident; that is, without any purpose in his heart so to do. On the contrary, all men of right feeling could but entertain the deepest sympathy with the one who should be so unfortunate as to take the life of his fellowman unwittingly or without any intention of so doing. On the other hand, whoever deliberately plans and purposes to take the life of his fellowman but fails in his purpose for any reason, is justly regarded as a murderer at heart, although, human law would not treat him as a murderer. In the sight of God, however, where motive counts for character, he is a murderer and will be treated as such.

If this be true in reference to sin, it is equally true in reference to acts of right-eousness or of obedience. Nothing is clearer from the teaching of Jesus than that it is not the deed in itself that counts, but the motive which prompts it. He that gives a cup of cold water in charity to a disciple because he is a disciple, will have greater reward in heaven than he who builds a church edifice or endows a college to atone for the sinful method by which he secured his wealth or for the purpose of self-glorification. It is on this principle that the poor widow, whom Jesus saw cast her mite into the treasury, gave more than all the wealthy donors. If God knows a man to be a murderer or an adulterer, who has not committed the outward acts corresponding to these sins, but who has the purpose so to do in his heart, so He knows one to be an obedient believer who loves Christ and who purposes in his heart to obey Him in all His commandments, even before he has had opportunity for manifesting his purpose by any outward acts. Because the Disciples of Christ have ever insisted on the importance of obedience to every command of our Lord and have emphasized the value of baptism as an act of surrender to Christ, in which believers secure the assurance of remission of sins, it is sometimes asked by our critics. What is to be the destiny of one who, having purposed in his heart as a true believer to obey Christ in the ordinance of baptism is suddenly taken away before there is opportunity of so doing? In the light of the principle above stated the question is easily answered. God accepts the purpose of the loving, loyal heart as obedience in the absence of any opportunity to give it an outward expression. Any one who could doubt this for a moment has never understood Christ and His most characteristic teaching.

On the other hand, a thousand baptisms will avail nothing to any one whose heart is not right in the sight of God. It is by the same principle that we are able to form a conclusion as to the moral status of those who, believing in Christ, earnestly desiring to obey all his commandments, err in their interpretation of some of them, but who, to the best of their ability, follow their Lord in all His requirements. Any one who knows Christ would esteem the condition of such persons to be infinitely more acceptable in the sight of God than that of one who had a perfect knowledge of His commandments and who had outwardly conformed to them, and who yet, in his heart, made only a partial surrender of his life to Christ. We must make the world understand that we who plead for the utmost loyalty to Christ and who emphasize the value of every ordinance and every commandment which He has given, also recognize and teach the supreme value of the heart with its motives and purposes in all matters of religion. If we fail to put the emphasis where Christ put it, on the motives and purposes of the heart, to that extent we fail in our aim to restore the Christianity of

As in the case of dealing with crime human courts of justice must wait on outward acts, so in dealing with believers, churches which are only human in their judgment must wait for overt acts—the open confession of Christ with the mouth and baptism as conditions of church membership. This is one reason why, no doubt, the command to be partized is associated with faith in a condition of membership in Christ's church. It is an outward, open and formal submission to Jesus as Lord. It is faith and penitence externalized, so that men can recognize them and act accordingly. It is not wise, therefore, to treat lightly an ordinance that has such deep and solemn significance any more than it is wise to lose sight of the distinction which Jesus Himself makes between the inner and essential conditions of character and the outward and formal manifestation of these inner conditions. To maintain a proper equipoise between the inner and vital, and the outward and formal, is a mark of a true church of Christ.

CHRISTIAN COLLEGE.

Our first page and several columns of our paper, this week, are devoted to Christian College, an institution of high grade for young ladies, located at Columbia, Missouri. This school has an honorable past. A large number of the cultivated Christian wives and mothers in Missouri and in other states have received their education and their Christian impulse at Christian College.

The institution, in the first place, is favored in its location. Columbia is one of the older and wealthier towns of the state, and being the seat of the State University. as well as of Stephens College, a school for young ladies under the auspices of the Baptists, and of Christian College, there is naturally an atmosphere of culture about the place which is stimulating to the students who gather there. Christian College is situated in an almost ideal campus, covered with forest trees, far enough from the business part of the town to be quiet, and has that homelike air which is so attractive to students coming from their own homes for residence during their student life.

Honorable as the record of this institution has been in the past, it has within the last two years under its present managers taken on new life and entered upon a wider career of usefulness. The enterprising principals-Mrs. W. T. Moore and Mrs. L. W. St. Clair-have erected a magnificent building which in commodsousness and completeness of equipment, and in adaption to the ends for which it was erected, compares favorable with the buildings of older and richly endowed institutions in the East. They have proceeded in this enterprise on the supposition that the people of Missouri and of the West desire for their daughters as good educational advantages and as good accommodations as can be found in the East, and they have aimed to supply this demand, not only by the erection of a building splendidly adapted to the needs of such a school, but by so enlarging and improving the courses of study, and the faculty of teachers as to make the institution high grade in every respect. The school is so articulated with the State University of Missouri that those receiving degrees from it, or completing courses of study within it, are given full credit for same on entering the university to pursue any postgraduate work.

This noteworthy advance of one of our institutions in the state deserves the special emphasis which we give to it in our columns this week, and should enlist the patronage and co-operation of the friends of female education throughout the West. Speaking from personal observation, we cannot speak too highly of the mental and moral disci pline which are enforced in the institution and of the religious influence which pervades it as an atmosphere. The Christian women who are at its head possess very superior qualification, both in the way of management and in the way of infusing their own spirit in the students. We can most heartily and conscientiously commend the school to parents who wish their daughters to have, not a mere smattering of learning, but genuine and thorough mental culture under moral and religious influence, and safeguards of the highest character.

MY DUTY TO THE PRAYER-MEETING.

(Heb. 3:12 14; 4:2; 10:25.)

[Uniform Midweek Prayer-meeting Topic, July 18.] CENTRAL TRUTH: Christianity is a social religion and involves the assembly of Christians and mutual help one to another.

A prominent and essential feature of Christianity is that it binds the followers of Christ together in bonds of mutual love and strength. Its teaching is that each one is to look, not after his own things only, but also upon the things of others. Every member is to study how he may help every other member, and so the church is to edify itself in love. This is only saying that love is the keynote of Christ's religion, and love involves the spirit of mutual helpfulness.

One of the most successful methods of helping each other which the experience of the church has found is to come together in stated meetings for the purpose of praying together and of exhorting one another. If each member had to exhort all the other members by visiting them at their homes daily, or even weekly, it would involve a great sacrifice of time and perhaps no little inconvenience to the persons visited as well as to the visitors. A better way is for the members to assemble at some appointed place where they may fulfill this injunction of exhorting one another. This duty, of course, is not to be limited to such meetings, but an assembly of Christians is a special opportunity, and to assemble with other Christians becomes, therefore, a special duty.

The established meeting of the church which best enables us to fulfill this obligation of mutual exhortation is our midweek prayer-meeting. This is its supreme object. Its service is of a social character and all have opportunity of participating. One of the first signs, perhaps, of a decrease in spiritual interest or the waning of faith is to be found in the tendency to neglect this meeting. Hence the author of the Hebrew letter exhorts Christians to "take heed, brethren, lest haply there shall be in any one of you an evil heart of unbelief, in falling away from the living God: but exhort one another day by day, so long as it is called to-day; lest any one of you be hardened by the deceitfulness of sin." There is a close connection in this writer's mind between "an evil heart of unbelief" and this failure to "exhort one another," a duty which is best fulfilled in the prayer-meeting.

The same writer in the second passage cited above, speaking of the history of Israel and comparing the religious condition of his brethren with that of their Jewish fathers, says: "For, indeed, we have had good tidings preached unto us, even as also they; but the Word of hearing did not profit them because they were not united by faith with them that heard." The reason given here why the people of Israel who perished in the wilderness were not profited by the gospel of promise which they heard is that "they were not united by faith with them that heard." Those careless hearers of the Word were not united withthe obedient hearers by living, active faith; hence the disaster which overtook them. The weaker members of a church would often receive strength from the stronger members if they would attend the stated meetings of the church, and particularly the prayer-meeting, which they are most given to neglecting.

In his further exhortation to the Hebrew Christians to hold fast to the confession of their hope that it waver not, he adds: "And let us consider one another to provoke unto love and good works; not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together as the custom of some is, but exhorting one another; and so much the more as ye see the day drawing nigh." Here again the duty of exhortation is enjoined and is coupled with the duty of assembling together for that purpose. No doubt there was a tendency among the Hebrew believers to neglect the meetings of the church, and this was one cause of their failure to make progress in Christian knowledge, for which they are rebuked in another chapter. Unfortunately, the custom of forsaking the assembly of the saints is all too prevalent in our day. Many excuse themselves from this duty on account of the weather, or weariness from their daily toil, or for social engagements, but the consequences are as certain now as they were at the time this chapter was written-waning of faith and spiritual declen-

The verse following the one quoted above. urging the duty of assembling, gives the following reason: "For if we sin willfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more a sacrifice for sins, but a certain fearful expectation of judgment and a fierceness of fire which shall devour the adversaries." This, of course, is the doom of the apostate from the faith, but the writer here, as in the former quotation, sees a close connection between neglecting the meetings of the church and apostasy from the faith. It is no doubt true that most cases of permanent apostasy have had their beginnings in neglecting to use the means of grace within our reach, prominent among which is the prayer-meeting.

Our duty to the prayer-meeting is not only to attend it, but to go prepared to add something to the interest of the meeting by the spirit of earnestness and devotion which we carry with us, and by participating in such way as we are able. As a rule it may be said that the destiny of any church is in the hands of those who are its regular attendants at the prayer-meeting; hence the larger the regular attendance the higher the spiritual tone of the church and the better its outlook for future triumphs.

PRAYER.

O, Thou who hears and answers prayer, our loving Father in heaven, we thank Thee for the privilege of calling upon Thy name, and we thank Thee for the prayer-meeting in which we come together to pray for and to exhort one another. We thank Thee for the bond of Christian love which draws Christians together and which enables them to exhort one another and to serve one another. If we have been neglectful of meeting with our brethren and sisters in the midweek prayer-meeting, help us to realize our loss and the loss of others by this neglect.of duty and to seek to be more faithful in the future. Increase, we pray Thee, the spirit of devotion in all our hearts, so that our meetings together here on earth may be but a foretaste of that great gathering of redeemed ones in heaven. For Christ's redeemed ones in heaven. sake. Amen!

Editor's Easy Chair Or MACATAWA MUSINGS.

Each successive Fourth of July deepens the conviction in our mind that a day which might be, and which ought to be, highly useful in inculcating a pure and enlightened form of Christian patriotism, and in disseminating information concerning the history of our country and the nature of our institutions, is practically wasted, or worse than wasted, even, in idle dissipation or "excursions," which seem to have no particular object but to benefit the railroads or steamboat lines. No doubt the old-fashioned Fourth of July celebration, with its spreadeagle oratory, is susceptible of improvement. But even that seems to us far preferable to the present method of observing or rather nonobserving our national birthday. Perhaps it was a revolt against the old-fashioned celebration that has resulted in no celebration, and that in the natural course of evolution we shall come to a rational and sensible method of celebrating so great an event as the birth of the greatest republic on earth. Especially at a time like the present, when so many grave problems confront the nation, does it seem important that the people should devote the day to a thoughtful study of our national duty and destiny. What better time could be found for impressing upon the people the vital importance of honesty in official life, of maintaining the purity of the ballot-box, of observing and enforcing laws enacted for the public welfare, of selecting men of high moral character to represent us, not only in the larger, but in the smaller offices in state and city and county, and of keeping alive in the hearts of the people that love of liberty which led our fathers to make such sacrifices for the establishment of this nation? Let us hope that some concerted action among our leading statesmen may lead to a wiser and more profitable observance of our great national anniversary.

Speaking of national perils, an article in the June number of the North American Review, by W. J. Bryan, sounds a needed warning against the danger of commercialism in American politics. One who is accustomed to looking at even political problems from the moral point of view can hardly fail to be impressed with the undue prominence given to commercial questions in current speeches and articles dealing with these problems. Mr. Bryan is entirely right in his warning, but he errs in supposing that the danger of commercialism is limited to one party. On the contrary, it seems to us that the greed for gain is entirely nonpartisan, and seeks refuge and the lever of power in all parties. Gov. Roosevelt, in his speech at the reunion of the Rough Riders in Oklahoma City, uttered a sentiment which we hope will have great emphasis in all parties during the coming campaign: "No nation, no matter how glorious its record, can exist unless it practices-practices, mind you, not merely preaches-civic honesty, civic decency, civic rightesusness. No nation can permanently prosper unless the Decalogue and the Golden Rule are its guide in public as in private life. Don't get into that most foolish of attitude of admiring mere smartness, unaccompanied by moral purpose." He enforces this truth by relating an incident in his ranch life in the West where a cowboy in his employ out of supposed lovalty to his employer, branded a neighbor's unbranded steer with his employer's brand. Roosevelt sent him home, telling him that "a man who would steal for him would steal from him." It is this rigid idea of honesty that is needed just now more than ever in all our public affairs in the cities, in state and nation. It is righteousness and not wealth that exalteth a nation.

One of the most delightful little books we have read for some time is that by Dr. Francis Edward Clark entitled "A Great Secret." It contains chapters on "The Secret of Health," "The Secret of Beauty," "The Secret of Happiness," "The Secret of Friend-making," "The Secret of Common Sense," "The Secret of Success," "What is it to Practice the Presence of God?" In a prefatory note the author explains that his object in the little book is "to present some of the less obvious and less understood results of communion with God." It breathes a spirit of peace, of restfulness, of quiet trust in and communion with God, well adapted to these turbulent times. It is a call to closer fellowship with God. It is an appeal for more godly, living presented in a a most winsome way, without any cant or pietistic platitudes. Young and old alike will relish it if they know anything of that feeling described by Jesus as "hungering and thirsting after righteousness." The feverish fretfulness of the lives of many professed Christians is a constant hindrance, not only to their own happiness, but to the progress of Christianity. We need to find the secret of peace, and we can only find it by doing what this little book urges us to do, and teaches us how to do—"practicing the presence of God"—a phrase which Dr. Clark quotes from Jeremy Taylor. We should be glad to know that many of our readers, during the summer season, have read this little book of Dr. Clark, which can be read through in a single evening, and especially that they are learning to "practice the presence of God."

On one of the unfrequented paths which wind through Macatawa woods we found the other day what seemed to be a tiny bluebird's egg. On taking it up, however, we found it was a mere shell, as the little birdling which erstwhile dwelt therein had found his wings and had flown. As we held the frail shell in our hand, the lines from Dr. Holmes' "Nautilus" came to our mind:

"Build thee more stately mansions, O my soul, As the swift seasons roll!

Leave thy low vaulted past!

Let each new temple, nobler than the last, Shut thee from heaven with a dome more vast, Till thou at length art free, Leaving thine outgrown shell by life's unresting sea."

What enlargement of life and joy and opportunity has come to this little birdling, which burst its narrow prison walls and is flying to-day in the free air, under the blue sky, singing its sweet notes with its fellows among the branches of the trees! Is there not in this fact a suggestion of our own enlarged future? Is it not in keeping with analogy, with Scripture, and certainly in harmony with the deepest aspirations of our souls, that we shall pass out of our present house of clay by the process which men call death into a larger liberty, into a more glorious life and into the wider activities and more blessed fellowships of the spiritual world? As the wings of the embryonic bird, while it was yet in its shell, were a prophecy of the enlarged liberty and life which it is now enjoying, so are not these desires and capacities of the soul, which the earth cannot satisfy, the prophecy of that larger life and liberty which are promised to us in the revelation

To-day has been a succession of rainstorms at Macatawa, as was the night preceding. The lake never looks more majestic than when a dark strom-cloud is advancing over it like an army with banners. Lashed into fury by the wings of the tempest, its foam-crested billows run before the wind as heralds of the coming storm. How majestically the clouds move, and what sublimity in the deep-toned thunder as it reverberates over the face of the deep! How the trees along the shore bend before the blast, and how the rain pours down, subduing the waves, beating upon the sand and roaring upon our cottage roof! These are the works of God, and the soul feels awed in the presence of these displays of power. To morrow, perchance, the sun will shine again, the blue sky will smile all the brighter, the birds will sing and nature will join us in observing the Lord's day. The hot days of the past week have sent us a number of recruits for our Christian colony, including C. C. Rowlison and wife, of the Third Church, Indianapolis, F. G. Tyrrell, of Chicago. J. S. Hughes and family, H. S. Earl and one of his sons are also in their cottages. Prof. Graham Taylor's family is here and he was with us and conducted our beech meeting last Lord's day evening.

Questions and Hnswers.

Why cannot the church and Sunday-school do the work that the societies and organizations are trying to do, of training the young and saving the fallen; or are the professed followers of Christ neglecting their duty along the line of work which gives rise to the different societies and organizations which are seemingly taking the place of church work in some places?

W. Harry Barron,

Mine La Motte, Mo.

We are not certain as to what "societies and organizations" are referred to in this question, but presumably those having a religious aim and work, as they only are engaged in "training the young and saving the fallen." If such organizations as, for instance, the Y. P. S. C. E. and missionary societies are meant, our reply is that these are not to be considered as something separate and apart from the church, but methods of work which the church has adopted to accomplish the end in view, just as the Sunday-school itself is another one of those methods of work. No one of these auxiliaries should be regarded as taking the place of the church, but as an organization within the church, working in harmony with its spirit and aim, and with its approval. It is easy to overdo the matter of organizations, and to have more machinery than is necessary for the work. In religious matters, just as in mechanics, the simpler the machinery the better, provided it accomplishes

Is it true, as the Dunkards claim, that the Greek Church has always practiced and still practices trine immersion?

H. C. Shropshire.

Brentwood, Cal.

The claim, we believe, is true. It is certain that the Greek Church has always practiced immersion, and does to-day, even in the case of infants.

- 1. Was Saul of Tarsus an inspired and chosen apostle of Christ before he was a Christian?
- 2. Was he a Christian before Ananias immersed him?
- 3. Was Saul a member of the body of Christ before he was an apostle?
- 4. Was he a member of that body before Ananias immersed him?
- 5. Is an individual a child of God as soon as he believes? Tereve.
- 1. Certainly not. He was probably chosen to be an apostle before his conversion, but he was not an apostle and not inspired until after his conversion.

- 2. In spirit and aim he was. In form he was not.
- 3. He was called to be an apostle at the time of his conversion, but his connection with Christ as his follower necessarily antedates his actual apostleship.
- 4. He was not a member of the visible Church of Christ on earth until his baptism, though he had doubtless surrendered his will and his heart to Christ when he asked: "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?"
- 5. All men are children of God by virtue of their creation in His image, but by reason of sin they must be "born again" and come into the true filial relation with God, through faith in Jesus Christ, manifested in surrender to him in the ordinance of baptism. Baptism is the act of faith by which we declare our acceptance of Christ and our identification with Him as His followers. It has no virtue apart from the fact that it is an expression of the believer's faith and purp se. This faith and purpose are, in the sight of God, the important matter, but the expression of that faith is both helpful to the individual himself and to others as well, as it marks the line between the decided and undecided, as near as any outward sign can mark it.

What immersionist bodies practice restricted communion? C.

All religious bodies, so far as we know, by their teaching, at least, "restrict" their communion service to believers in Christ. A majority of Baptist Churches restrict their communion to those who have been immersed. A few congregations known as Churches of Christ in England do likewise.

What is the meaning of Matthew 12:43-45; especially, what is meant by the vnclean spirit going out of a man, walking through dry places, seeking rest and finding none, and returning unto his house from whence he came out and finding it empty, swept and garnished, goes in and takes unto himself seven other spirits more wicked than himself?

John Childers.

Claremore, Ore.

The spiritual teaching for us in the above passage is that it is not enough to cleanse our hearts of an evil spirit, and permit the heart to remain empty. It must be occupied by the spirit of truth and righteousness, or else the wicked spirit will return and the man will become worse than before. In other words, the Christian life consists, not simply in putting away the evil, but in the actual practice of the good; not simply in the expulsion of an evil spirit, but in the possession of the divine Spirit. It is a positive life, not merely negative. This lesson applies to the man who resolves to break off his evil habits, and thinks to do so in his own strength, but does not propose to become a Christian and engage in active, aggressive Christian work. Such an one will be apt to find himself the victim of other evil passions before long. Only the light can expel darkness. The heart that would avoid evil thoughts and desires must be filled with pure thoughts and holy desires.

CAMPBELL ON THE DESIGN OF BAPTISM.

W. A. OLDHAM.

What did Campbell teach as to the design of baptism? For long years, until recently, he was supposed to teach that the blood of Christ, the procuring cause, met the sinner in the act of baptism and his sins were removed. The instrumental cause was baptism. Mr. Rice says: "He maintains that the sins of penitent believers are remitted in the act of immersion, never before." Mr. Campbell's friends and enemies alike have supposed that so far Mr. Rice correctly represents Mr. Campbell. The latter enters no protest, and thus tacitly admits that he is correctly represented. It is strange that a writer so clear, so pellucidly clear as Mr. Campbell has been misunderstood, and so long misunderstood. Moreover, Mr. Rice twice quotes the passage from the McC lla debate-quotes it to prove that it contradicted what Mr. Campbell was then affirming. So it does. Mr. Rice quotes: "What does he say? 'Paul's sins were really pardoned when he believed.' This is all for which I am contending-that the sins of every individual are really pardoned when he believes. I could shake hands with my friend over this sentiment, and we might have something like Christian union" (Debate, p. 516). Mr. Campbell does not deny that this contradicts what he was then affirming. This is a tacit admission that he had changed.

Mr. Rice in his opening speech says: "In the previous part or this discussion it has been my business to advance views in regard to which we differ from some of our Christian brethren of evangelical churches. I am happy this morning to take my stand on the broad ground on which the great body of Protestant Christians are united." Now, what is that "broad ground"? Here it is, plainly expressed: "Baptism is the external sign, faith is the internal grace; the latter unites us to Christ really, the former connects us with him formally." Mr. Rice correctly affirms that he represents the Protestant world on the design of baptism. "Really pardoned when we believed, formally when we were baptized." But this is precisely the position which has recently been exploited as being Mr. Campbell's position. Mr. Campbell for forty long years thought that he and the other part of the Protestant world differed as to the design of baptism; they were under the same delusion! The fact is that some of Mr. Campbell's professed followers have surrendered to the sectarian world on this point. One of them, at least, has. When Mr. Campbell used the words of the McCalla extract he was undergoing a mental evolution not yet completed. In the Rice debate the evolution was complete, and the issue then as now was this: "Faith for the real, baptism for the formal remission;" Rice and Protestants affirming, Campbell denying the first phrase.

Again, Mr. Campbell asserted that baptism was, among other things, for the formaremission of sins. Nobody denies. But it was also for the real and true remission:

"While, then, baptism is ordained for the remission of sins, and for no other specific purpose, it is not as a procuring cause, as a meritorious or efficient cause, but as an instrumental cause, in which faith and repentance are developed and made fruitful and effectual in the changing of our state and spiritual relations to the divine persons whose names are put upon us in the very act. It is also a solemn pledge and a formal assurance on the part of our Father that he has forgiven all our offenses-a positive, sensible, solemn seal and pledge that, through faith in the blood of the slain Lamb of God and through repentance, we are thus publicly declared forgiven and formally obtain assurance of acceptance and pardon," etc. Keep this passage in mind. There are others of like import, but we shall presently need it.

As illustrations are in order, here are some which Mr. Campbell used:

"Lavinia was the servant of Palemon, and once thought him a hard master. She changed her views of him, and her feelings were also changed toward him; still, however, she continued in the state of a handmaid. Palemon offered her first his heart, then his hand, and she accepted them. He vowed and she vowed before witnesses, and she became his wife. Then, and not till then, was her state changed. She is no longer a servant-she is now a wife. A change of views and feelings led to this change of state; but let it be noted that this might not have issued in a change of state; for Maria, another handmaid of Palemon, changed her views of him and her feelings toward him as much, nay, more than did Lavinia; yet Maria lived and died the servant of Palemon and Lavinia.

"William Aricola and his brother Thomas, both Canadians, were once much opposed to the constituted government of New England. They both changed their views, and as a matter of course, their feelings were changed. William became a citizen of Rhode Island, but Thomas, notwithstanding his change of heart, lived and died a colonial subject of the British king.

"John and James Superbus became great enemies to each other. They continued irreconciled for many years. At length a change of views brought about a change of heart; but this change for more than a year was concealed in the heart, and no overt act appeared. They were not reconciled until mutual concessions were made and pledges of a change of feeling were tendered and reciprocated. From enemies they became friends.

"A thousand analogies might be adduced to show that though a change of state often, nay, generally, results from a change of feelings, and this from a change of views, yet a change of state does not generally follow, and is sometimes quite different from and cannot be identified with a change of heart. So in religion, a man may change his views of Jesus, and his heart may also be changed toward him; but unless a change of state ensues he is still unpardoned, unjustsfied, unsanctified, unreconciled, unadopted and lost to all Christian life and enjoyment. For it has been shown that these terms represent states and not feelings, condition and not character; and that the change of views or of heart is not a change of state. To change a state, then, is to pass into a new relation; it is not sentiment nor feeling. Some act, then, constitutional, by stipulation proposed, sensible, manifest, must be performed by one or both parties before such a change can be accomplished. Whatever the act of faith may be, it necessarily becomes the line of demarcation between the two states before described. On this side and on that mankind are in quite different states. On the one side they are pardoned, justified, sanctified, reconciled, adopted, saved; on the other they are in a state of condemnation. This act is sometimes called immersion, regeneration, etc."

Until I had copied this extract I had not noticed that Mr. Rice also quoted it almost as I have, for the purpose of showing Mr. Campbell's position. What a pity that Mr. Campbell did not correct thus: "Before baptism the penitent believer is formally unpardoned, formally unjustified, formally unsanctified, formally unreconciled, formally unadopted and formally lost to all Christian life and enjoyment!" If he had thus corrected, then that debate would have ended on the spot, they would have shaken hands, and on the design of baptism at least there would have been Christian union. By inserting formally and tormal where Mr. Campbell never inserted them, where he never intended that they should be inserted, as he had a thousand hints that he ought to insert them, but did not, he is made to appear to teach faith for real, baptism for the formal remission of sins. The whole argument is one huge petitio principii, or begging of the question. It assumes the whole question in dispute by inserting the word formal where Mr. Campbell omitted it.

We have in the last number of the CHRIS-TIAN-EVANGELIST quite a number of illustrations or, as Mr. Campbell calls them, "analogies." Their whole argumentative force lies in this fact: they make clear the thought in the writer's mind, but they do not prove its truth. We capture this whole battery of guns in this way, and turn them on the enemy. . Here is one of them: "The American people cast their ballots for President. A B receives a majority of the votes. This is the voice of the people. The vote is counted and the result announced. All understand the question is settled. This is the real thing. At the proper time the President-elect takes the oath of office and enters upon the discharge of his duties. This is the formal part of the proceedings." Examine well, for we shall turn it on the enemy in a moment. Here is its counterpart: "The people of Kentucky cast their ballots for governor. Mr. Taylor receives a majority of the votes. This is the voice of the people. The vote is counted and the result announced. All understand the question is settled. This is the real tning. At the proper time the governor-elect takes the oath of office and enters upon the discharge of his duties. This is the formal part of the proceedings, but Beckham is governor and Taylor a fugitive. What is the trouble? Just a little misunderstanding as to the meaning of the little phrase, "the real thing." What is the real thing? Undoubtedly, the office of governor, its honors, emoluments and enjoyments. The casting of the ballots was a step toward the real thing, the taking of the oath and entering upon the duties other steps. Taylor took all these steps but the last. That last step was the boundary line between the real thing and the unreal, between the private citizen and the governor. On one side a private citizen, on the other, governor. Because the last step could not be taken, on account of the legislature, Taylor is now a private citizen, a fugitive. Reader, if you will be so kind and are willing to storm some of these other batteries, please do so. It is a fine exercise, and they can be turned just as easily.

The parable of the prodigal son is a beautiful picture. The party of the opposite part uses it well to illustrate his own thought, but it neither proves it to be true nor refutes the other side. Nothing is said in the whole parable about faith or repentance or baptism. The parable teaches, as God beautifully shows, that the sinner is an object of God's pity, that the sinner is valuable in the sight of God, that God loves the sinner, but to press it beyond this violates one of the fundamental laws of parabolic interpretation: "Do not press the analogy too far," or beyond what the writer intended.

The case of Paul, as presented in the article in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, begs several questions which should be proved, not assumed. 1. It assumes that Paul was converted before baptism. We deny. 2. It assumes that Paul received the Spirit before baptism. We deny. Meyer, the great German exegete, uses this language, commenting on this very passage: "Which then followed at baptism." What followed at baptism? What followed at baptism Paul was filled with the Holy Spirit at baptism. Meyer elsewhere says: "For the Holy Spirit is only received after baptism (Acts 2:38; 19:5, 6; Ti. 3:5, 6); the case in Acts 10:47 is execptional." The case of Acts 10:47 is the case of Cornelius. Meyer and Campbell are here agreed.

Another fallacy: "Whosoever believeth on him shall receive remission of sins" (Peter). The devils believed, therefore the devils have remission. The priests, who refused to acknowledge him, believed, therefore they had remission of sins. What the the trouble. The old fallacy of ambiguous

The word belief is ambiguous. In the argument if it were reduced to syllogistic form it would be clearly seen that there are four terms instead of three, as required by the rules of logic. The faith of the devils, the faith of the believing priests, who refused to confess, was dead faith, because it did not lead to obedience. Peter is not speaking of dead faith, but of living faith, a faith whose first sign of life is the act of baptism. To living faith, crowned by this sign of life, baptism, comes remission of sins. The last step taken the believer enters upon the real thing, the enjoyment of remission. If he does not take that step, then like Taylor in Kentucky he can never enjoy the emoluments, the pleasures the rewards of forgiveness. The "instrumental cause," baptism, "in which faith and repentance are developed and made fruitful and effectual in changing the state of condemnation for one of pardon, the state of guilt for the state of innocence, the state of sorrow for the state of joy." Yes, as Mr. Campbell's ninth proposition reads, it is not faith, but an act of faith, an act resulting from faith, which changes our state, and Mr. Campbell did not insert "formally" before "changes."

As to Cornelius. He was baptized into Christ. "Into always denotes change of position; a transition from one state to another. It marks boundaries. A person enters into, not in matrimony. A person is baptized in water, into Moses, into Christ, or into his death," etc. (Campbell Debate). The holy spirit fell on Cornelius to show that he, a Gentile, and consequently all Gentiles was entitled to "the real thing," remission of sins, through baptism, the instrumental cause. Faith, repentance, confession, obedience, all means to the great end, remission of sins. The last step carried him over to the boundary line between the countries called sin and salvation. Mr. Campbell did not insert formally before into.

OUR COLLEGES—III. A Dangerous Choice.

N. J. AYLSWORTH.

We have seen that the rising of the intellect to dominance, which normally takes place in the college course, tends to sweep away the foundation of the childish character, and that this may take place apart from any unsettling environment, and even in an atmosphere which is religious rather than otherwise. The change comes about by a law of mental development, and is as natural as that chrysalis change which transforms the worm into a winged flower. We cannot change this law. We may be broken by it, but we cannot annul it. It speaks in terms of stern command our duty regarding the college, and the parent's duty regarding the choice of an educational institution for his child. In view of this fact, what shall we say of a university which ignores this law completely, provides education for the intellect alone, has professors of national or world-wide reputation who are avowedly agnostic, and has a particolored student body whose moral hue is largely pagan? It is not too much to say that such an institution may prove a spiritual slaughterhouse. Ought all Christians, then, to discard the state university? By no means. Its unlimited resources provided by the state render it possible for it to be a most admirable postgraduate school; but a godless school is no place for the boy of sixteen or eighteen, leaving home for the first time, and facing that profound change which attends the birth of the intellectual life. The state university for such a case ignores a law of the human mind, and the result must be disastrous.

But the case is worse than this. Agnosticism is everywhere. It is in the air we breathe. It lurks serpentlike in the newspaper, in the periodical, in the popular novel; it flits in the conversation of the parlor and of the street; it glances in a look, in an inflection, in a tone. We suck it in as we do malaria. Reverence, that stronghold of religion, is dying out. The truth is that the world is itself on a large scale passing through the unsettlement and peril of an enormous awakening of the intellect. Popular education and the discoveries of science on working a mighty revolution. The foundations of all knowledge are being examined. Rough hands are laid on the holiest sanctities of the heart. Cold, clear, heartless intellect is having an inning, and it laughs at our darkening skies and the bleeding of the heart. The crisis will pass, and religion will be better buttressed than before; but the very fact that it is now in the balances being weighed fosters doubt, and many souls will go out in darkness. What a time is this to send our youth to agnostic schools? Were it not a stupendous folly, it would be a religious crime. With your left hand give your dollars to convert the low-browed savage, and with your right deliver your Christian boy into pagan hands to be heathenized! What missionary work is this! To-morrow this boy will take your place; how then will it fare with missions? Whiten black Africa; blacken white America-is that your program? Christianize paganism; paganize Christendom—is that your work in the Master's vineyard? There never has been an hour since our world swung into space when it was so important that the birth of the intellect should be presided over by religious influences as now. It is winter without, to the heart; if it be winter also within the college, the boy is lost.

many religious students, and may they not band together for mutual help? They may; but your boy may not be a Christian, and if he is, there may be other influences that will determine his associations. Only the youth of strongest religious nature is safe—nay, even he may stagger and fall at the birth of the intellect. It is very easy to keep warm in a warm room, but it would be sorry work with a stove out doors in zero weather. It is out-doors in such a college, and the little student stove is a poor substitute for the warm room. Frozen to death, will be the spiritual epitaph of many a soul in that bleak region. Let the intellect come to its throne; answer its questions; place strong rational foundations beneath faith; reconstruct the childhood character on the manly basis—and your boy may then go to such a place without great danger of harm. But to put him there before all this is to give him a stone when the heart cries out for bread.

But we have not yet reached the full situ-Who are these young people who are going away to our colleges? They the brightest youth of our land, and they are going away to be clothed with thunder. They will be the leaders of thought and man the responsible positions of the next generation. Before God all souls are equal, but in the arena of battle one shall put to flight a thousand. Our future is in the hands of our educated youth. What they are we shall be. If we surrender them to agnosticism, we are lost. That parent who blinks this question is an enemy in the night, sowing tares in the kingdom of heaven. All may look well now, but—the future! A great Protestant people has just uttered the cry: "I am sick." It has been the leader of American evangelism, its equipment is mag-nificent, and yet this strong warrior that has smitten sin with might for cen uries is staggering and its power to stay is gone. There are denominational diagnoses in plenty, but it is no time for party prattle. There is an enemy somewhere; and to-morrow it may be curs to say: "I am sick." It will be easy to rest in superficial explanations and blink the deeper reasons until it is too late. It is no time to commit stupidities or play with that sharp knife, education. It is an hour for Christian statesmanship; and one of the grave questions which that statesmanship will ask is: "What shall we do with the college boy?"

Christian College: Its History and Outlook **

A Short Outline of the History of Christian College at Columbia,

The first charter ever granted by the Legislature of Missouri for the collegiate education of Protestant, woman was that which incorporated Christian College, Columbia, Mo., Jan. 18, 1851.

In November, 1849, Dr. Samuel Hatch and Prof. Henry H. White, of Bacon College, Harrodsburg, Ky., came to Columbia with the view of inaugurating a "Female Collegiate Institute" of the highest grade. They, in connection with D. P. Henderson and James Shannon, LL. D., who was in 1849 elected to the presidency of Missouri University, successfully carried the project into execution and on the recommendation of Dr. Shannon, John Augustus Williams, of Kentucky, was elected the first president of the newly founded institution. A small house in the town was at first used, but so rapidly did the school grow that its friends were encouraged to secure the necessary buildings. The incompleted residence and twenty-nine acres of ground belonging to the estate of Dr. J. S. Bennet was purchased in 1851 and the building was opened for the regular session in September of the same year. To the original structure, designed as a private residence, have been added during the last 49 years improvements and buildings which make the present college edifice one of the most commodious in the West.

Mr. Williams was succeeded as president in 1856 by L. B. Wilkes, the original financial agent. Mr. Wilkes' administration only extended over a period of two years, but during that time he did very much towards putting the college in the forefront among the leading institutions of the West. His successfor, President J. K. Rogers, completed the work thus begun, and during twenty years governed the institution with wisdom and success. Several times during the war the Union soldiers bivouaced near the college buildings, but whilst other institutions closed their doors, President Rogers allowed neither war nor anything else to draw him from his post. He made a name both for himself and Christian College which will live in the annals of the state.

Pres. Rogers was succeeded on his death by Prof. G. S. Bryant, of Independence, Mo., and the latter resigned in 1884 in favor of W. A. Oldham, of Lexington, Ky. Pres. Oldham was succeeded in 1893 by F. P. St. Clair, an educator of experience and ability whose association with the college meant to the friends of the school larger attainment and greater usefulness. Pres. St. Clair's untimely death occurred only a few months after his election to office, and he was succeeded by his wife, Mrs. Luella Wilcox St. Clair, the first woman president of Christian College, and probably the youngest woman president in the United States. Mrs. St. Clair's administration was one of complete success, during which she changed a young ladies' seminary into a high-class college for young women with modern methods and aims. On account of a long and severe illness Mrs. St. Clair resigned her position in the spring of 1897 and was succeeded by Mrs. W. T. Moore.

Under Mrs. Moore's administration the attendance by resident students became so large that the college was crowded to its limit, and both years students were refused entrance on account of lack of room. Mrs. Moore's success demonstrated the need of new and larger buildings, and in the spring of 1899, with Mrs. W. T. Moore and Mrs. L. W. St. Clair as co-principals, arrangements were consummated for the beautiful new Christian College, which as a complete educational plant for young women is not surpassed by any school in America. No school has done, or is doing, more for the Christian education of young womanhood than Christian College, whose power for good is growing with the passing Present Status of Christian College.—Official Statement of the Trustees.

We, the Board of Trustees of Christian Female College, located at Columbia, Mo. desire to make the following full and complete statement of the present status of the college, that our brethren throughout this and other states may be in full sympathy with our work, and this can only come from knowledge.

Christian College in the fall of 1898 was in its forty-seventh year, and was occupying an old brick building entirely inadequate to the demands of the number of students demanding resident accommodations. Besides being old the buildings were unsanitary, water standing much of the time in the cellar, and the walls in the brick wings were in a cracked condition, and there was a question of their safety. The school had never been endowed, and was already burdened by a debt of $9,000. We realized the deplorable condition of affairs, but felt powerless to do what was necessary to save the school from rapid disintegration. Several times the trustees met with the president, Sieter W. T. Moore, and ex-president, Sister L. W. St. Cl ir, to discuss the question of ways and means for providing the needed building for the school. The result of these deliberations was that Sister St. Cair was appointed financial secretary, and instructed to so'icit subscriptions to the amount of $50,000, such subscriptions being only due and valid when the above-named amount was assured. Sisters Moore and St. Clair being profoundly interested in the welfare of Christian College, and desiring to assist in establishing a great school for girls in the Southwest, each pledged $5,000 to the hoped-for subscription of $50,000.

Sister St. Clair visited a number of prominent members of the Christian Church, and while meeting with best wishes and profoundest faith in Christian College, she also encountered the apathy which meets every worker in our educational cause. To make a long story short, Sister St. Clair, while encouraged by some financial success (especially among the citizens of Columbia), saw that to raise $50,000 in time to save the school (if it could be raised at all) was impossible.

the only course now open to us as trustees was to borrow an additional $6,000, with which sum we could erect a small addition to the dormitory to relieve the crowded condition of the building. This would have made our debt $15,000, all that the college property would carry.

To all those interested this was a poor makeshift. Knowing the deep interest felt by Sisters Moore and St. Clair in the school, and that they were willing and able to take a financial responsibility in the matter, the trustees proposed to turn the college property over to these ladies on the following conditions:

- (1) That they should assume and pay the debt of $9,000.
- (2) That the property should not pass into their hands until improvements to the amount of $20,000 should have been made.
- (3) That at any time the present Board of Trustees, or any member or members of the Christian Church, might have the privilege of repurchasing the property for the amount invested in it by Sisters Moore and St. Clair, without interest. (In this event these ladies to leave invested $5,000 each as a permanent gift to the college.)
- (4) That Sisters Moore and St. Clair should assure the trustees that the school would continue on the same lines upon which it was inaugurated, and fulfill the purpose of its wise and beneficent founders.

Sisters Moore and St. Clair agreed to all these conditions, and as the charter of the college and the Board of Trustees both remain unchanged, we may expect from a combination of the tried forces of the past and the new strength of the present great results.

In March, 1899, operations were begun toward the erection of a splendid new building, and at the end of the year the following has been accomplished: The debt of $9,000 has been paid in full; a beautiful new dormitory, accommodating 150 students, has been built, equipped and occupied; and these expenditures, amounting in all to $70,000, have been met or provided for by the principals. The defective parts of the old building have been removed, and the central building (the original college) is to be retained and remodeled, so as to serve the purpose of a conservatory of music.

Christian College stands to-day the only school of the Christian Church (except the two orphan schools) for the exclusive education of girls in this state. With its splendid history of forty-nine years, its present prestige and powers for good, it has no equa as a great educating influence among th classes of young women who will mold the future of church, society and home.

One thing to which we desire to call especial and emphatic attention is that Sisters Moore and St. Clair have only come into the breach temporarily. They have invested their private resources and assumed a heavy financial responsibility, hoping, by the terms of their contract, to return the property at an early day without interest and with the gift of $10,000 to some body representative of the Christian Church in this Until this can be done they feel themselves to be only guardians in co-operation with the present Board of Trustees of this great institution. One of our church schools for girls in a neighboring state is owned by a syndicate of men, all members of the church, and this plan might be advantageously pursued in connection with Christian College. As a business proposition the college was never so well worth being owned by the church as a strong factor in our work as now. By the statement of Messrs. Lacaff and Landmann, builders of the new dormitory, this building could not now be duplicated for less than a $12,000 increase upon the contract price of a year ago. This increase in valuation, plus the $10,000 from Sisters Moore and St. Clair would mean an accretion of $22,000 in the future ownership of this college.

As trustees we desire to say on behalf of Sisters Moore and St. Clair, that while they do not hesitate to carry the responsibility they have assumed, and while we believe they are fully able to do so, at the same time they are perfectly willing and ready to surrender their trust whenever a suitable person or persons can be found to take their place. From the beginning they have occupied an unselfish position in the matter, as anyone can plainly see who will look at the conditions of their contract with the trustees.

Here is, therefore, an opportunity for some consecrated wealth among our people to be invested in a work whose Christian importance cannot be estimated.

Let us hear from the church in this great question of the Christian education of our daughters.

Signed on behalf of the Board of Trustees Christian Female College.

The New Christian College.

In this issue of the Christian-Evangelist is shown an engraving of the new main building of Christian College, completed in February 1900. This building is of Elizabethan style, built of pressed brick and Bedford stone, heated by steam and lighted by electricity. The students' living rooms are arranged en suite-two students occupying a bed chamber and a study, each room having a large clothes closet with hooks and shelves. The interior finish of the building is in hard wood; floors are of white maple, highly polished, obviating the necessity of unhygienic carpet. Each floor has two suites of bath and toilet rooms. The main building contains rooms for the accomodation of 150 students, besides those reserved for the use of the family and faculty. Other apartments are a suite of three drawing rooms, library, reading room, public and private offices, private library, assembly room, art studios, gymnasium, infirmary, dining hall 47x49 feet, matron's suite, kitchen, pantry, storeroom, serving room, laundry, etc.

This building has a fine south frontage of 228 feet, with a wing at the west, extending north 112 feet. There are three stories above the ground floor, the roof is of slate and the entire building is practically fireproof. The plan is the result of the best ability of an experienced architect, and for educational purposes, comfort, convenience and perfect sanitation is unequaled by any school for women in the Southwest.

Plans are in hand to continue the improvement of Christian College by building to the west of the main building a chapel (a handsome auditorium seating 1,500 people), and to the east a Conservatory of Music. When completed this group of magnificent buildings will afford the highest educational facilities known to modern educators.

FROM THE FRIENDS OF CHRIS-TIAN COLLEGE.

Allow me to trespass upon your valuable time enough to send my congratulations on the splendid opening of the dear old college. True merit brings its reward, and you certainly have been most graciously remembered. As I wrote our mutual friend some time ago, I would be most happy to be able to see and aid in making the college the leading school of the West. . . . I most earnestly pray for the success of yourselves and the college. A prosperous year is the MRS. J. K. ROGERS. wish of your friend,

It gives me pleasure to express the confidence I feel in Christian College at Columbia, under the management of Mrs. Moore and Mrs. St. Clair. The courses of instruction in the college are apbroved for all courses in the State University. The Music, Art, and Elocution are in my opinion excellent. The moral and Christian influences are of the best. R. H. JESSE.

President of the University of the State of Mis-

I have examined, officially, the work done by Christian College in physics, and I believe it is as thoroughly done as in any female college in the land. The college is approved by the University of Missouri, both for the course in Arts and for the course in Science. Christian College is endeavoring to make her students useful as well as ornamental members of society.
M. L. LIPSCOMB,

Professor of Physics, Mo. State University.

I have pleasure in saying that the Christian churches in Missouri are to be congratulated on the completion and equipment of the magnificent new buildings for "Christian College." I wish also to express my confidence in the thorough fitness of the ladies in charge of this favorite ladies' college, as well as their consecration and their devotion to our Lord, and the special plea made by the Christian Churches of our great state. This great college ought to have a great patronage. Respect'ully,

T. P. HALEY, Pastor Christian Church. Kansas City, Mo.

I have known Christian College from its foundation, fifty years ago, and am quite willing to bear testimony to the fact-for it is a fact-that it has done as much to advance the educational interests of the young women of Missouri as any institution in the Valley of the Mississippi. More than this: under its present management, with large new buildings of modern architecture, splendidly equipped in every department, it is far better prepared to educate, benefit and uplift in every way the daughters of the Central West than ever before in its long and enviable history.

Very truly, WM. F. SWITZLER, Editor and Historian. Columbia, Mo.

I take pleasure in saying that I have personal acquaintance with both of the ladies who now have control of Christian College. I have known Mrs. St. Clair from the time that she was a schoolgirl in Hamilton College, Kentucky. I have complete confidence in their skill as educators, and in their power to train young ladies to the truest conceptions of a noble life. I believe that if life and health are spared them they will advance the honored institution under their management to a greater and more widespread usefulness than it has experienced in its past history. I recommend them without hesitation or qualification to the confidence and patronage of all with whom my word has an influence

J. W. McGarvey.

Pres. of Bible College, Kentucky University Lexinaton, Ky.

I desire to congratulate you and all the friends of Christian College upon the almostfifty years of blessed history which it has made in the education of young women for happy and useful lives. It has been my pleasure to meet many of the graduates of the college, and I have found that in whatever walks of life their feet have been treading, the flowers of a beautiful Christian womanhood have bloomed along their way. May the Lord continue his richest blessing upon the work of Christian College, and may you be given wisdom and grace from on high to direct the sacred interests that lie upon your hearts.

W. F. RICHARDSON, Pastor of First Christian Church. Kansas City, Mo.

During a recent visit to Columbia I was much surprised to find the new buildings of Christian College so beautiful and complete in every way. All that is necessary for the comfort of young women, while pursuing their studies, is provided. The management is in the hands of two superior Christian ladies who, in mind and heart, have had most thorough preparation for their work. One sees order and intelligent direction on every hand, and a close attachment between teachers and pupils. The institution is now old enough to have valuable traditions, which will increase the college spirit and bring to it a wider patronage. I believe God will bless the faith that has planned for larger things. Parents will show wisdom in committing their daughters to the care of Christian College. LEVI MARSHALL.

Pastor First Christian Church.

It will be well for us as a people to send our children to our own schools, at any rate for college work proper. That periodo in the life of a young man or young woman is a critical one. It is the time of imaginary brilliancy and independence; a time when the moral and spiritual influences of home should be kept intact. After that they may take a university course; but in this formative period let us see to it that the surroundings of our children shall be such as to strengthen their faith in the Bible and confirm them in the purity of life required in that sacrde volume. It gives me pleasure to say that Christion College, at Columbia, Mo., under the wise supervision of Sisters Moore and St. Clair, is a model school for young women. The instruction is thorough and the management and discipline the most homelike and protective.

D. R. DUNGAN, A. M., LL.D., Pres. of Christian University.

Canton, Mo.

The friends of Christian College are to be congratulated on the new career which is being opened up before this institution, under the capable management of Mrs. W. T. Moore and Mrs. L. W. St. Clair. With a new equipment of buildings and apparatus, and new and magnetic leadership, this famous school promises to continue doing for girls and young women an invaluable service.

I feel confident that we are to have in this institution a college of which not only Missouri but the West will feel proud; a college which will rank with famed Wellesley and other schools of the East. Why not? Its location is all that can be desired, its history is fragrant with blessed memories and its promoters are giving to it their hearts as well as their brains.

FRANK G. TYRELL,
Pastor of First Christian Church.
Chicago, Ill.

A few months ago I had the good fortune to spend a week under the hospitable roof of Columbia Christian College in the family and in the larger school family of Dr. and Mrs. W. T. Moore. In renewing my old English friendship with these good people I enjoyed an excellent oppportunity to observe and note the character and management of the school under the present able and efficient administration, and I am expressing myself in moderation when I say I was delighted with what I saw and heard. No pains are spared by these accomplished women to conduct the school on the highest plane of attainable efficiency. I was especially impressed with the tact and skill and management and the teaching ability that characterizes every department of the college. The ideal of manners and morals and religion and education inculcated are of the highest and finest order, and I have no hesitancy whatever in rec-

Christian College has made a record in the education of young women that should commend it to the favor and consideration of all having daughters to educate. Through a long series of years it has been sending forth to the various spheres of feminine activity many noble women fully prepared for all duties that might devolve upon them. The institution has now better equipments in buildings and appointments for efficient work than in all its history. The buildings have been enlarged and ample room provided for all college purposes. At the head of this splendid institution are two women, Mrs. W. T. Moore and Mrs. L. W. St. Clair, whose personal attributes, extended culture and wide acquisitions place them among the most advanced educators of our day, and are a sufficient assurance to all parents that their daughters, placed under their tuition, will enjoy advantages equal to the best afforded in our country. Our people especially should take a just pride in this splendid institution and contribute in every way to its maintenance and advancement. J. P. PINKERTON.

MY VISIT TO CHRISTIAN COLLEGE.

Last November I spent several days in this school visiting my daughter, who is one of its pupils, and I wish to write a few lines concerning what I observed.

First, this institution is pre-eminently Christian. This characteristic is quietly and lovingly and persistently emphasized in every department. I was as deeply impressed with the sweet, sacred, spiritual atmosphere as if attending one of our great conventions. I do not believe any girl could remain here through a term without being influenced for good by this potent factor.

Second, the thoroughness of the work in every department is patent to the most casual observer. No slipshod method nor slighted preparation is tolerated in teacher or pupil. The work that is done is well done.

Third, the discipline is excellent. Under the present management there is perfect order and system, without even a shadow of intimation of harsh, tyrannical treatment. These two Christian women control and yet hold the respect and love of all the girls. The work moves along without friction.

Fourth, the physical welfare of every pupil is carfully looked after. Wholesome food is furnished, the proper exercise required and hygienic environments obtained.

Parents need not have the slightest fear in placing their daughters in this school. It is all that could be required, and is what its name implies in the full meaning of the two words—Christian and College. E. B. DAWSON, M.D.,

Pastor Christian Church.

Belton, Mo.

Having witnessed the opening of Christian College in the fall of 1851, and having since lived continuously almost within the shadow of the institution, it is a pleasure to say a word in its behalf.

The college has grown from the day of its birth, until now it is without a rival in the state and can truthfully be regarded as the "Wellesley of the West." In looking back over the past, if I were asked what particular force has contributed more than any other to the phenomenal growth and strength of the Christian denomination in this state I would say Christian College. This school, through the army of students sent out from its halls, has ramified the whole state and planted the tenets of the faith in almost every home. While the school is under the Christian Church influence, as its name implies, nevertheless it is not exclusively or strictly speaking a denominational school; the fact is that very many of the most broadly educated women of the West, without regard to denominational bias, are graduates of Christian College and are to-day among its warmest supporters.

Under the madagement of Mrs. W. Moore and Mrs. L. W. St. Clair, two ladies of extensive learning and experience in the education of young women, with a new college building erected at a cost of $60,000 and furnished with every known facilty for imparting instruction, we hail a future for Christian College unlooked for in the past by its most sanguine friends. To this magnificent seat of learning, under instructors of distinguished ability, will come young women from every section to enjoy educational advantages that other colleges may rival but few, if any, surpass. This child of the Christian Church, and the pride of the state, looks back on a glorious past and forward to a future more bright, more promising and grander than ever.

Respectfully, R. B. PRICE,
President of the Boone County National Bank, and Treasurer of the Missouri State University.

Excerpt from open letter to L. B. Wilkes, in Register-Review, June 7, 1900:

"Now as to Christian College, let me say that I am not officially connected with that institution and never have been. There are others much better qualified to speak than I am. But let me say that there are some of the same men on the board of trustees now that were there when you were one of its members, and I believe in my heart that they have been growing in grace and in the knowledge of God's truth and are better men now than they were then. I also know that the two women at the head of Christian College are among the most cultured, refined Christian women in the Church of God. Their business enterprise, when the old building became untenable and inadequate, surprised and delighted all who understood the real condition of things. I honor the memory of President J. K. Rogers. He was a man after my own heart, and he lives today in the hearts of a thousand women he educated at Christian College. I believe if he were living he would heartily commend the work of Christian College now."

G. A. HOFFMANN.

Excerpt from open letter to L. B. Wilkes in Register-Review, June 7, 1900:

"But as to its religious character, and this is the feature in which more people are interested, let me assure Bro. Wilkes it is still "Christian" College. The-charter, as I remember it, provides that three-fourths of the Board of Trustees shall be members of the Christian Church. No doubt Bro. Wilkes had something to do with this wise provision. I have been a member of the board five years and during that time every member of the board has been a member of the Christian Church. Some of the present members were members in the days of Bro. Wilkes and I think they will say the institution was never more truly Christian, not even under the management of Bro. Wilkes, than it is at present.

The young ladies are required to attend Sundayschool and Sunday morning service and are allowed to attend the other services, which they frequently do, especially the Sunday evening service. They have a Young Woman's Christian Association which meets every Sunday afternoon. Also an auxiliary to the Christian Woman's Board of Missions; both of these are in a very prosperous condition. For two years, the junior and senior, the young ladies are required to take regular work in the Bible College, and a failure to do the required work here would deprive them of their diplomas. Bro. W. T. Moore, who is not a stranger to Bro. Wilkes, is teacher of Ethics and Christian Evidences and I think he can be trusted to give Christian instruction.

I have seen as many as ten of these young ladies come forward at a single service to confess Christ. This not during a protracted meeting or after a special effort upon the part of some member of the faculty to impress them with their duty, it was not even known to the faculty that they were coming. I have seen them come by twos and threes and fives at our regular service when nearly all their schoolmates would be in tears. I speak of this to show that the religious atmosphere of Christian College is healthy and challenge any institution to show a larger per cent. of conversions each year from among the students. Several years we have sent nearly every one of them back to their homes Christians. There are other facts that might be presented but surely this is sufficient."

The Outlook for Christian College.

Christian College has never had a broader, brighter outlook than now. With a faculty of twenty-five able and experienced instructors and officers, an ideal college home, and a Christian atmosphere which leads its students in the "paths of righteousness," we may expect the fruits of its labors to be indeed of the highest order.

Before the close of the past school year more than sixty students engaged rooms for the coming session, so that when September rolls round the halls of the new college promise to be filled with a company of bright-faced girls eager to begin the ascent of Mount Parnassus.

Such a school as Christian College is not only a matter of local pride, but is an institution to which the state may point as one of the brightest gems in her crown of education.

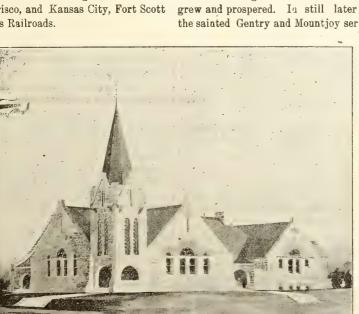

Columbia (Mo.) the Home of Christian College.

Columbia is a most beautiful and attractive little city of 6,000 inhabitants, midway between St. Louis and Kansas City. It is conveniently reached from the east, north and west by the Wabash Railroad and connecting lines. The opening of the Missouri Midland Railroad renders access to it easy from the south and southwest. This road connects with the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroad at McBaine and affords a direct route to Columbia to persons living on that line and to those living on the Missouri Pacific, Frisco, and Kansas City, Fort Scott & Memphis Railroads.

being inaugurated, and these marks of the best civilization, together with good roads, pure air and desirable climate, make Columbia an ideal place for students. From the rigorous North to the enervating South girls come to Columbia, finding in Christian College an educational home of the highest value.

The Church of Christ at Columbia,

This church was founded in 1832, with some eighteen charter members, the brethren meeting in a small brick chapel west of the court-house. In that day Marcus Wills was preaching up and down in the land, and occasionally occupying the Columbia pulpit. Between the years 1843 and 1846 the venerated Samuel Church was the pastor. Shortly after this, in the '50's, President Shannon conducted the State University affairs and preached on Lord's days for the congregation, T. M. Allen dividing the labors with him from year to year. The location of the church was changed to the present site in 1861, a substantial brick church having been erected. This was dedicated by Moses E. Lard in a famous meeting. After this began the era of J. K. Rogers and L. B. Wilkes, through whose faithful services Christian College and the Christian Church grew and prospered. In still later times the sainted Gentry and Mountjoy served the

FIRST CHRISTIAN CHURCH, COLUMBIA, MO.

Columbia's proud boast of being the "Athens of Missouri" is well sustained by her array of institutions of learning. The State University is located here and with the scope given by its vast endowment and fine faculty is a strong factor in Columbia's great future. The town is devoted almost entirely to the interests of education since, in addition to the university, there are two colleges for young women, two academies, an excellent high school, public schools, private schools and private classes.

A commodious and modern hospital has been recently completed in Columbia and will be equipped with the best means known to science for the care of the sick and afflicted. A splendid system of sewerage is just brethren, followed by J. B. Jones, B. C. Deweese, W. A. Oldham, J. H. Foy and J. S. Shouse.

In 1892 the foundation of the present building was laid and a year or two after the church entered into as handsome a sanctuary as the state affords. The congregation being composed of excellent citizens, and having had the best of teaching and example has a healthy conscience and a mind to work. During the past dozen years its Sunday-school constituency and its church membership have been thoroughly organized into various active societies, so that it has come to be a pleasure to lend a hand in benevolent enterprises and in the establishment of missions. Five years ago last month Bro. C. H. Winders came among us and he has shown him elf to be a workman of whom none need be ashamed. At the time of his arrival our membership was 464. Over 400 have been added since, but on account of dismissals and deaths we can report but 646. Although having erected a $30,000 building all has been paid off but $2,800 and that is provided for.

Under the present administrati n I can truly say we have a live, working church. Of course, there is room for improvement. Where is it that there are no idlers in the vineyard? Surely not here, and still our membership is largely spiritual, while our preachers and officers are clean and capable as well as good, earnest men, watching the interests of the church and laboring for its welfare. The inspiration derived from the hundreds of students attending services from the university and from Christian College, to say nothing of the other educational institutions, can only be imagined by those who are similarly located. 'Tis a joy to meet with them and to aid them in their search after truth. But there is always room for one more, and if not we will make room. With a seating capacity of 900 some of us are seriously contemplating expansion. We feel that we cannot, dare not stand in the way of such vigorous growth. Our schools are doubling their numbers, and as they mass their forces the church will endeavor to keep step with them. Although many of our members have no personal relation to the colleges, there is absolute harmony between the students and the citizens, and on the Lord's day they literally sit and sing together in heavenly places.

Its healthful location, beautiful scenery, good hotels and complete immunity from hay fever make a summer outing at Marquette, Mich., very attractive from the standpoint of health, rest and comfort.

- -All eyes are upon China.
- -"Why do the heathen rage?"
- -The oldest and newest civilizations of the world have collided in China.
- —The massiveness of the Chinese population, if cemented by an anti-foreign spirit, would tax the military resources of the world.
- —But China is divided; she is in the midst of one of the greatest revolutions of the ages. The missionaries of the cross have gotten in their work and the old empire is crumbling to pieces.
- —She may defy the armies of the world for awhile, but she must eventually acknowledge the supremacy of the Christian religion and of the Western civilizations. The "Far East" is disappearing.
- —The collection for Foreign Missions for the week ending July 5th were $4,854.61. Gain over last year, $330.67.
- —We are glad to report that Bro. Rains is able to return to his work from Battle Creek, Mich., where he has been recuperating for several weeks. He says that he is about well again.
- —The Missionary Intelligencer for July is an exceptionally interesting number. Do not forget that this is the mouthpiece of our Foreign Society and that you are not posted on our foreign work if you do not read this magazine. The war upon foreigners in China greatly intensifies interest in our missionaries and missions in the foreign field.
- —"On the Rock," cloth-bound, for seventy-five cents, is a great offer of a great book. This is the book that has always sold for $1.50. This offer expires July 23.
- —The Christian Endeavor convention for the state of Pennsylvania will be held in Philadelphia next November, and the Endeavorers of Philadelphia are showing their interest and wisdom by beginning to prepare for the event in good season. We commend their enterprise.
- —Business and Christianity for June continues the reputation of this unique magazine for original features, exhilarating news and striking Church Extension arguments. Send to G. W. Muckley, Kansas City, Mo., for a copy.
- —The Students Missionary Campaign Library arranged by the Foreign Board, Cincinnati, O., should command the attention of all our preachers, Bible Schools and Endeavor Societies. It contains lectures, biographies, convention reports, history, and, in fact, everything to instruct and interest young people in the cause of worldwide evangelization. It consists of sixteen of the very best modern missionary books, bound in uniform size, and will be furnished at lowest cost for cash. All orders should be addressed to the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, Cincinnati, Ohio, Box 884.
- -The quiet citizen and the conservative church member ought to learn a lesson from the great St. Louis street car strike as well as the street car companies and the strikers, and that is that indifference to crime, public moral and industrial conditions is in itself criminal. Good citizenship means an active interest in public morals, public rights, municipal reforms, economic measures, industrial conditions and other matters of public interest. It is time for preachers to post up on the issues of the day-condition of the masses, the brotherhood of man and the Fatherhood of God. Keep the leaven of righteousness at work in the business domain and strikes will be less frequent if not wholly prevented. "Public and Private Rights" advertised in this paper would be a good book for you to begin with.

- —Brethren who expect to attend the Missouri state convention at Moberly, Sept. 17-20, are requested to send their names as early as possible to S. B. Moore, pastor of the Central Church, of Moberly, that homes may be provided for them. Lodging and breakfast will be given free; dinner and supper will be served at the church.
- —Only a very few days remain in which to take advantage of our offer of "On the Rock" for seventy-five cents. We cannot fill any orders reaching us on or after July 23, but prior to that date we will send the fine, cloth-bound edition, 358 pages, for seventy-five cents, postpaid. This is just half the regular price.
- -The Open Air Association of America, with headquarters at 123 Amity Street, Brooklyn, New York, have issued a circular letter urging all ministers of the gospel and Y. M. C. A. workers to use every opportunity possible this summer for holding out-door services, and if any suggestions are wanted on how to make these meetings attractive and successful, a letter addressed to its secretary, Miss Eloise V. Prentice, at above address, will secure the desired information. The The suggestion for out-door services is good for many reasons, but it takes both wisdom and pains to make them spiritually helpful. However, that does not argue that they should not be held. We wish that the multitudes from our crowded cities could be reache! in that way every summer.
- —C. M. Kreidler has been in North Tonawanda, N. Y., since last October. Reports of the work show that there have been nearly on hundred persons brought to Christ at the regular services of the church. Over $800 have been raised for missions and $2,200 have been expended on the enlargement and beautifying of their building. The local auxiliary to the C. W. B. M. has increased from a membership of thirty-five to nearly one hundred and fifty. An enthusiastic Junior Endeavor Society has been organized. All the departments of the work are active and aggressive.
- —Dr. B. B. Tyler's address until July 23 will be Worcester, Mass. Address all letters intended for him in care Rev. F. A. Nichols, pastor of the church in Worcester.
- —The general tone and spirit of the church news reported in the New England Messenger indicate a healthful condition of things in our brotherhood throughout New England.
- —The Gospel Messenger, edited by Cary Es Morgan, Richmond, Va., in the interest of the churches of Christ in Richmond and Manchester is to have a vacation from July to September. The Gospel Messenger is among our best local papers, and seems to be about the best patronized by advertisers of any church paper we have yet
- —During the past few months we have made a number of splendid offers of first-class volumes at startlingly low prices, but our offer of "On the Rock," cloth edition, for seventy-five cents, promises to be the most popular of them all. We are compelled, however, to limit this offer to July 22. We cannot fill any orders reaching us after that date. Lest you forget the matter, you had better send your order immediately.
- —The Fountain Park Assembly, Remington, Ind., opens July 28 and continues until August 12. The sixth annual program of this assembly is just out, and provides a rare course of lectures; sermons and entertainments. Among the prominent men who will appear before the assembly this session is Dr. B. B. Tyler, of the correspondence staff of the Christian-Evangelist. The railroads are offering low rates to the sessions of this assembly, and one of the best sessions in its history is anticipated by the management.

- —The Foreign Society has received $1,700 on the annuity plan. This fund now amounts to $87,190, or only $12,810 short of the $100,000 the society hopes to complete this year on this plan.
- —The receipts for Foreign Missions to July 1st, amount to $132,569.64, or a gain of $18,838.03. There is no reason why the $200,000 should not be raised for Foreign Missions by Sept. 30th.
- —We have a few copies of "Forty Yeary in China," by R. H. Graves, D. D. This is a famous book—one of the standard volumes on China and the Chinese. In view of present disturbances in the Chinese Empire, all literature on China is now of special importance. The regular price of this volume is $1.50, but we now offer it for $1. It is handsomely bound in cloth, contains 316 pages and is profusely illustrated:
- -We ask our readers to give Bro. Oldham, whose second article on "Alexander Campbell and the Operation of the Holy Spirit" appeared last week, a patient hearing, as he presents the passages from Mr. Campbell's writings which seem to him to sustain his position. When he has furnished us the additional article which he promises we shall have something to say on the subject, not in any spirit of controversy, and perhaps not in the way of direct reply to Bro. Oldham, but in bringing out another view of the subject and another side of Mr. Campbell's teaching. Mr. Campbell, like the rest of us, entertained views at one time in his life which were modified by further research and by deeper religious experience. It is due to him and especially to the cause which he sought to advance that there be a full presentation of his views on the subject under consideration. We will only state here that the difference between the propositions that the Holy Spirit operates only through the Word, and that He operates only through the truth, is too manifest for any man of Mr. Campbell's spiritual insight to have overlooked. Tru h is conveyed far more effectively in life than in mere words. Jesus taught this when he said: "Let your light so shine before men that they, seeing your good works, may be constrained to glorify your Father which is in heaven." This constraining power of good works, of pure lives, is none the less the power of the Spirit because it has been transmuted into life and operates by example on the minds and hearts of men. To affirm any proposition that excludes this method of the Spirit's influence in conversion and sanctification would be to contradict, not only the Scriptures themselves, but the plainest facts of our religious experience.

-At the recent congregational meeting of the Central Church of Christ, Dayton, O., where I. J. Cahill ministers, the financial reports showed a total of $7,690 raised during the past year in all departments of the church; $625 contributed to missions, 80 people added to the church, all at regular services.

-E. T. McFarland, of the Fourth Church and S. R. Moore, of the Compton Heights Church, were out of the city last Sunday and their pulpits were supplied, the former by A. J. Marshall, of Carondelet, and the latter by Geo. Stoll, of this city. Bro. Sornborger preached at Carondelet and the assistant editor of this paper at Ellendale. At the First Church special services were held in respect of the departure of Bro. Cook, the assistant pastor, who goes to a pastorate in Ohio. Bro. McFarland will be out of the city for three or four weeks on a vacation, which he very much needs. Bro. Sornborger has been called to preach for the Carondelet Church for three months and the church will be aided in this work by the kindness of the state board.

-In a letter from our faithful brother, J. F. Callahan, concerning the duty of the church toward our "Old Guard," he says:

I wish you to observe that there is no little stir about the way of helping the "Old Guard." Many are suffering in silence. In battle it was hand to hand; now with them it is too often "hand to mouth." We need an arousing on this line of practical Christianity like that of ninety years ago on the restoration of primitive practice, ancient order, etc. See how the board is short of funds even to deal out a pittance to appeals from embarrassed friends of old preachers. to "go" ahead, but are prone to forget to "do" unto others as we would have them do unto us. want to see a fair trial of the Golden Rule.

-Clark Braden has issued a tract of eight pages, book size, in which he boldly accepts the challenges published by Mormons for a public discussion of their leading religious tenets. In this tract Clark Braden publishes a list of endorsements of leading men, churches and church papers of the Disciples of Christ long enough and strong enough to forever settle the question as to his ability and worthiness to meet any Mormon representative in any community, town or city. If they now refuse to meet him in debate it may be fairly concluded that it is because of their conscious inability to defend Mormonism in his presence. If any church or community is troubled with this sect they cannot do better than to send for Clark Braden to come to their rescue, or scatter R. B. Neal's tracts thereabout. Either will do the work.

-The briefest yet clearest statement of parliamentary rules that we have yet seen is that prepared by Rev. George F. Robertson, Uniontown, Pa. It is a vest pocket, manilla-paper folder, with about all that one needs to know about parliamentary matters on the the two inside pages. The points on one side and explanations on the other are alphabetically related.

We are closing out the Twenty-eighth Edition of this great work, by D. R. Dungan. In all the literature of the Disciples of Christ no work has been so widely circulated as this. The Twenty-eighth Edition is handsomely bound in cloth, printed on fine book paper and contains 358 pages. Notice the reduction in price:

-The article in our Family Circle this week, entitled "The University of Adversity," will be found to be particularly interesting. -The interest which that very interesting magazine, How to Grow Flowers, has created in the improvement of villages in many places is highly commendable. Village improvement associations have been formed and the streets and public vards in many villages have been made as attractive as a park or flower garden. How To Grow Flowers is published in Springfield, Ohio, and is a magazine we take pleasure in commending to our readers, and parties interested in the improvement would do well to send for their recently published issue illustrating work done in various places by village improvement associations.

-Some whose articles have not appeared as promptly as expected when sent have been writing to know the cause. As we have frequently stated, we often get snowed under with copy, especially when we get out a special edition. It simply becomes a mathematical impossibility to publish all that is sent for publication, and at such a time we have to make such selections as will keep the paper as representative in every way as possible. Among the articles withheld at such a time are often contributions from our ablest writers; and, at times, editorials. The St. Louis Letter has not appeared for weeks, giving preference to others. If those who write would remember how many others want to be heard but cannot, and would be more brief, there would be more room. We find it difficult to keep some of our regular correspondents within prescribed limits. They will exceed their bounds in spite of our repeated injunctions. But we will not despair. We shall give you a hearing at the earliest opportunity.

An Open Letter.

The most casual observer cannot fail to see that many of our millionaires and multi-millionaires have gleaned their millions off of the public by the use of public rights, and yet there is not that outspoken opposition to this class of wrongs that the crime demands. The public conscience is exceedingly dull toward this unjust and oppressive system of robbery, and this fact has led to the most daring boldness on the part of franchise grabbers and others who prey upon the rights of the public. It is also equally noticeable that some of the greatest industrial upheavels our country has yet known has "happened in connection with some business founded upon some one or other of our public utilities or rights.

These and other observations have led the writer to prepare a small book (64 pages) on Public and Private Rights in the hope of drawing attention more particularly to the importance of public rights in contradistinction to individual or private rights. The importance of this distinction in civil government cannot be overestimat d. Our courts recognize a distinction between public and private rights in judicial affairs, but the dis-tinction has not been carried out to its legitimate ends in civil governments as it should have been. There is need, therefore, that the people should know to what extent this principle applies in a just government.

In addition to emphasizing this principle io my book I have also endeavored to give a brief sketch of some of the leading civil and economic reform measures of the day. As it is now these measures are treated so separately that too much reading is required to get knowledge of them. In my book they are gathered together in such relation as they seem to sustain toward each other, so that the reader may get a perspective of what leading men are advocating for the relief of our country from the evils of which we complain. Believing that I have been of some service to many at least in the preparation of Such a commend it to your prayerful attention. ON THE ROCK. LAST CHANCE. LAST CHANCE.

This is our last advertisement of 'On the Rock' at half price. As previously announced, our offer of this great book expires July 23. After that date we will not sell it. Until that time we are offering the edition in cloth 358 pages which regularly sells for $1.50 for only Seventy-five Cents. This is just half price > REDUCED TO $1.50 75c.

Doubtless most of our readers are familiar with this work, or have heard of it. While fascinating as a story, it is at the same time an unsurpased treatise on the subject of baptism, and a treatise in a form that will be read where the ordinary tract or book on the subject would be refused or thrown aside. One patron writes us: "Send me a copy of 'On the Rock.' I have six copies loaned out now, but I need at least one more." This shows the value placed on the book by those who know it well.

REMEMBER that this offer positively expires on July 23. If you wish to take advantage of it, the only safe thing to do is to send your order AT ONCE, before you forget it. You will never again be able to purchase this work so cheaply.

DANGEROUS DRIFTS.

More and more fickle are the movements of our most trusted public leaders. The cross-currents of our English affairs bewilder my soul. The latest pirouette performance is that of Mr. John Morley. To think that he of all our great men should go twirling about on the light fantastic toe, despising the old landmarks, scandalizing the grand traditions of Gladstonian Liberalism and rushing down the slopes of Socialism to the bottomless abyss of the most rabid Revolutionism is equivalent to thinking that henceforth order, stability and political sense are hustled out of existence. I like Mr. John Morley for his honesty; but I dislike Mr. John Morley for his unreliability. We are getting in politics into a position analogous to that religious condition which drove Manning, Newman and Faber into popery. Those Anglican clergymen found all their Protestant infallibilities had vanished, and so they could not find any mooring for their souls in the Protestant Church. They took the Pope for their infallibility. Hopeless fallibility is the ascertained curse of modern public life. Gladstone's followers in great numbers lost confidence in bim, and now Salisbury's droves of dupes are discovering that they have been dished, deceived and deluded. Well, then, if after Lord Salisbury's regime is over, and if it is now fairly realized that Liberalism is dead, it should next be realized that Radicalism is drifting into Morleyism-what will be the consequence? I think it is easy to forecast one result at least. A tremendous struggle will come on between two new parties. A new kind of Toryism will crystallize itself into a league under Mr. Balfour, and a new kind of Socialism will be developed under the lead of Mr. Morley. Between these there will be a long and fierce conflict. And it will at last reduce itself into a struggle between the "haves" and the "have nots." The men of property will be compelled to fight for their proprietary existence with the swarms of lacklanders, good and bad. The difficulty will be that in each of the coming parties there will be a good and an evil section. Unfortunately, the blackguards on each side will tend to take the lead, and the noble spirits will lie in the background looking on. Covetous, greedy, unscrupulous landlords and speculators, with the gin millers and lawyers and pensioned generals, will snatch at power on the Tory side; while the captains on the opposite side will not be the genuine reformers and Christian Socialists, but the agitators and anarchists and infidels. What is beyond this prospect I cannot guess. Poor humanity is preparing for itself a rehearsal of Armageddon. Christ and Beelzebub will at last settle the outcome between themselves. Why do I thus reflect on the last great speech of Mr. Morley? Because that able leader has uniformly expressed his passionate antagonism to the Christian religion. And yet he is rapidly becoming the only possible leader of the Liberalism of to-morrow. That being so the Christian churches will be compelled to fling all their influence into the scale against Liberalism, while the vast majority of them have no sympathy with Toryism on its unscrupulous side. Does not this consideration indicate that we are about to drift into a fearful quagmire?

DEAD AND RESURRECTED QUAKERISM.

A very singular phenomenon in modern religious life is attracting attention in thoughtful minds. The Spectator, the able London organ of the Broad Church, has been animadverting on it in an article of a kind which I am surprised no journalist has produced before. It is printed out in this article that the Friends or Quakers are rapidly decreas-ing and will hardly exist at all in the next generation. Of course, those characteristics of Quakerism which are strangling it are obvious enough. A close community, which demands from its children a certain overstrict renunciation of the pleasures of the world and a certain separation from even innocent ways of ordinary life and fashion, constrains the boys and girls to slip away as from prison into paradise at the first opportunity. But to some extent this occurs also in all circles which are at all puritanical, and yet the Puritan sects continue to increase by receiving countless recruits through the attractiveness of spiritual life and power. What is singular is that the principles of Quakerism are everywhere being adopted, while the Quakers themselves are dying out. Their distinctive ideas are included under lost doctrines. The first and central idea is that a Christian should follow the inner light: that is, the best opinion which Christ generates in his heart. The second doctrine is an inevitable result out of the first, that religion being purely spiritual and self-generated, or generated by the Holy Spirit in the individual, there can be no necessity for forms or ceremonies, for a ministry, or for what is ordinarily known as a Christ, is a thought which prevails with thousands, just as the first doctrine does. For Christians in these days seem to sit more and more loose to their churches. These two doctrines are spreading all through the churches of all denominations and are every day producing a spiritual independence which, as multitudes of ministers sorrowfully testify, tends to develop into religious anarchy. The faith in sacerdotalism has vanished; the great ceremonials have become mere acts and proclaim theoretical or traditional belief, and no church has as a church a reverence derived from anything but opinion. The loyalty felt for country far surpasses in enthusiasm the loyalty felt for any church. Then, moreover, the belief that philanthrophy is the essence of Christianity, and that each man owes a greater debt to his brother man, whom he sees and knows, than to a God whom he cannot see or know, has become the conviction of the greater part of the nation, and is upheld by great numbers even of those who in reality care not a straw or make never a sacrifice for their brother man. These doctrines come direct from Quakerism and have permeated the community so that some millions are Quakers at heart who would be indignant if dubbed with the name. These despise the Quakers and would on no account join the Society of Friends, and yet they are practicing their cardinal tenets. The result of unconscious Quakerism is disastrous, as is the effect of the influence of Plymouth Brethrenism on vast numbers of people who would by no means class themselves with any of the cliques or coteries of Darby, Newton, Macintosh, Muller or any other of the cardinals of Plymouthism. When a sect dies out, the good it has accomplished dies also. but the evil it has done remains. Here is one more of the curses of sectism, in addition to the long list too well known. Quakerism has played itself out as a farce which worked spiritual benefit in its protest against materialism, but it leaves a bad legacy of mysticism and indifference to the necessity of concrete forms of obedience to the will of Christ.

THE SPIRITS IN PRISON.

Among the texts often explained in anything but a satisfactory and conclusive manner is 1 Peter 3:19: "He went and preached to the spirits in prison." Canon Wilberforce, who is perhaps the most eloquent regular preacher in London, took this text for his sermon at the recent World's Temperance Congress. He delivered the discourse in Westminster Abbey to a vast congregation. I must say it was a magnificent specimen of his oratory. But he commenced it by a most dogmatic pronouncem nt, which I will quote: "Much ingenuity," said the Canon, "has been expended by the representatives of certain phases of theological thought in vain endeavors to explain this glorious incident away. When they succeed in arguing the sun out of the heavens upon such a day as to-day, they will succeed in eliminating from the hearts and hopes of men the glorious lesson of this incident. It is direct, intelligible, historical and conclusive." This is a very strong utterance on the part of Canon Wilberforce. I think it is much too strong. Exegesis and criticism are somewhat set at defiance by this assumption that all who decline the positive view thus expressed are hopelessly wrong. But while I do not think the Canon is justified in thus hurling his dictum at the heads of others and in skipping all argument against what he called the "missionary descent of Christ into hades," I have, in examining during these many years all the most learned efforts by commentators on the other side, felt painfully convinced that they succeed poorly in the function of "explaining away." I am still looking for a really satisfactory interpretation of Peter's famous words. I must do Canon Wilberforce justice, though I disapprove of his over-dogmatism. He did not introduce his text in order to discant upon it hermeneutically, but only to use it as a homiletic jumping-pole with which to leap into his subject. Desiring to expatiate on the awful hell of the drink traffic he exhibited Christianity as the great agency which alone could descend with missionary success into this dark prison. And his sermon was a truly sublime effort.

The Lands of the Long Day.

A GLIMPSE OF DENMARK.

It has never been my lot to travel much in Europe by rail, though in some other ways I have been about the continent a little, but from casual glimpses of stations and cars I had formed rather an unfavorable estimate of European railways as regards comfort. Whether or not this hasty condemnation would be justified by long experience is a question. At least it was not substantiated by an all-day ride from Paris to Frankfort-on-the Main. The old-fashioned European railway car, built like a series of non-communicating omnibuses joined at the sides and with a door at each end of each compartment, is being developed, perhaps under the influence of the American example, into into a corridor-car, not essentially unlike the most up-to-date product of our own car factories. We started with the corridor and only recently learned to introduce the compartment feature. They started with the compartments and are now adding the corridor. The corridor represents the free intermingling and social indeterminateness which characterizes American life; the compartment embodies the idea of the segregation of classes, the social barriers between man and man, and the general inflexibility which is generally conceived to distinguish European society. Conclusion: the Americanization of Europe and the Europeanization of America are two correlated processes which are operating simultaneously for the production of a thoroughly cosmopolitan civilization, and this fact is exhibited even in the construction of railroad cars. (The philosophical reader may develop this suggestion ad libitum. The writer is at present aiming to tell a story of travel, not to construct a philosophy of history.)

As I was saying, it was a good train. It had a well-conducted dining car, sleeping cars, automatic chocolate-distributors (drop ten pfennig in the slot) and all the other conveniences of civilized life. I cannot wouch for the merits of the sleeping cars. The name of them in French means only "bed-wagons," which is rather noncommittal, but the German name assures you that they are also "sleep wagons," and that is much more comforting. But whatever the virtues of these continental sleeping cars, I finished my journey on that train late in the evening and for the night ride to Gottingen I had to take a slow train with only day coaches. Here I distinguisted myself as a patrician by going second-class while every one else in he train went third or fourth. This reckless luxury of mine seemed to interest the conductor mightily. He was a fatherly old man, and at every station he came into my compartment, which of course I had to myself, and woke me up to ask me how I was sleeping. It was two o'clock, I remember, when he came in to tell me that there would be time to get a cup of coffee at the next station.

The little German city of Gottingen is a place of the most venerable antiquity, and it looks its age. It is full of old timbered houses with red tile roofs, curious gables and projecting upper stories, and the whole is embowered in lilacs and hawthorne. The old inhabitants say that the climate is uniformly abomina le. It was during my two days there. Nothing in the city pleased me better than a pair of stone lions in front of the Rathhaus. They are so old that no one pretends to know when they began to be, but they still present some youthful qualities. There is a certain brisk canine alertness about their features which partly suggests the vigilance of a good watchdog and savors still more strongly of the impertinent curiosity of a ratterrier. Like Riki-tiki-tavi, the mongoose in the Jungle-Book, they appear constantly to "want to find out," for purposes either of public weal or private satisfaction. In a celebration of the anniversary of the battle of Sedan a few years ago, the lions were painted red to harmonize with the rest of the decorations and a tinge of the pigment still lingers in the whiskers of one of the beasts. This heightens his appearance of culpable inquisitiveness. It makes him look as if he had been caught stealing the raspberry jam.

But Gottingen's real fame at the present day is wrapped up in its university. In theology its brightest stars are Wellhausen, Smend and Shultz. In physics it gives well-authenticated proof of having constructed the first electric telegraph, fifteen years before Morse made his discovery. In mathematics it ranks with Zurich and (almost) with Paris. In dueling it ranks with Heidelberg and Bonn. The famous friendship between Bismarck and the historian Motley dated from the days when they were fellow-students here.

It is only a few hours by rail from this old university town to the busy modern city of Hamburg. Here my bicycle was waiting for me, stamping its tires and champing its handle-bars, so to speak. After a stay of only a few hours, I mounted it and started on my bicycle trip toward the Land of the Midnight Sun. From Hamburg to Kiel is a pleasant sixty-mile ride across Schloswig-Holstein from the shore of the North Sea to the shore of the Baltic. It is a thinly populated country, with fewer pastures full of black-and-white cattle than I had expected to find and more moorland, heather and ground-pine.

From Kiel one may enter Denmark either by proceeding by land straight north into the Peninsula of Jutland, or going by sea across a corner of the Baltic to the large Danish island of Zealand, which almost blocks the channel between Jutland and Scandinavia. I chose 'the latter route, and after a delightful five hours' sail over a summer sea stepped upon Danish soil at Korsor.

On the boat I fell in with a couple of German wheelmen, teachers in the Hamburg schools, and we journeyed together for a couple of days. We had a merry time trying to learn Danish together by the inductive method. It is a barbarous sounding language to one unacquainted with it. In fact, most languages are so, except French and Italian. But the chief difficulty which one encounters in conversing with these northern peoples, whether Dane, Swede or Norse, is that they do not talk with their hands, and they do not understand any one who relies chiefly upon that means of communication. The art of pantomime has not been developed here as among the Latin races. In Italy I can go into any hotel and, without uttering a word, order a bed and something to eat and drink by the use of three simple signs, little jerks of the head and thumb, which can be made as quickly as the words can be spoken, and are universally understood. But here in Scandinavia one must have words.

So my German friends and I, all being at the start equally innocent of Danish, hastened to get words by inducing the waiter at our first hotel to tell us the name of everything on the table and in the room. It is said that a good deal of English is spoken in Denmark, and there seems to be more truth in the statement than there usually is in such claims-such, for instance, as those about the prevalence of French in Italy and English in Holland. The fact that the Princess of Wales is a member of the Danish royal family has less to do with the case, I suppose, than the close commercial relations which subsist between the two countries, but at any rate there is a surprising amount of English spoken in the shops and restaurants in Denmark.

My German friends had some virtues as traveling companions which all Germans do not possess. They did not drink beer to excess, and they took baths with most un-German regularity. The chief inconvenience about riding with them was that they stopped to eat five times a day. But they were good companions, intelligent, well informed and interested in everything from sausage to cathedrals, and they had a cheerful way of singing good old German songs as we rode. One evening after a hard afternoon ride we found ourselves seated about a well-loaded table, the German end of which was well garnished with bottles and glasses. It was then that one of my companions rose almost to eloquence as, patting that part of his anatomy which is most natural to pat under those circumstances, he exclaimed with emotion, "Die Welt ist schoen."

It is a charming ride of sixty miles across this Danish island from our port of debarkation to Copenhagen. The fields and pastures look rich, and an air of prosperity pervades the country. Most of these descendants of the warlike Danes, who harassed England in the days of King Alfred, seem to have settled down into the quieter industry of making butter and cheese.

At the town of Roskilde, which lies somewhere near the center of the island, is a cathedral which contains the tombs of all the Danish sovereigns for several centuries. It is to Denmark what St. Denis is to France. The churce is a relic of the days when Roskilde was the metropolis and capital of the kingdom and Copenhagen was a fishing village. As in the Dutch cathedrals, there has been some reconstruction of the interior to meet the requirements of the Protestant service, and whitewash and paint have been used to give it a cheerful look. The general effect is quite Dutch, but it escapes the ugliness which marks most of the Dutch churches. It was an ecclesiastical highday when we were there and we attended a service in the cathedral. The minister, who delivered his discourse from a high pepperbox pulpit fastened against one of the pillars, was clad in a black gown and white neckruff of the Puritan pattern, which gave him a striking likeness to the pictures of Governor Winthrop. The theology of the sermon was sound so far as I could tell. An old gentleman of genteel aspect and attired in full evening dress (it was then eleven A. M.) strolled idly about the church during service and doubtless discharged some function which he considered im-

Copenhagen is a handsome and spacious city, especially notable for its excellent harbor, its Danish mastiffs, its Thorwaldsen statues and its pretty girls. In the latter particular I do not claim to be a close observer, but it is my opinion, as the result of somewhat extensive though entirely casual observation, that the average of female beauty is higher in Copenhagen than in any other city in Europe. It is no wonder that the good old chi dren's game of "Copenhagen" (only children play it I believe) bears the rame it does. No doubt it originated here, and it couldn't have started in a place where its charms would be more potent.

ESTEY PIANOS & AND ORGANS

Excel in Superior Tone, Perfect Construction and Great Durability, THE ESTEY CO., ST. LOUIS, MO

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

The city of Brockton is about eighteen miles from Boston and has a population of probably 40,000. It is in Plymouth County and is eighteen or twenty miles from Plymouth Rock. The principal industry is the manufacture of shoes. There is not an open saloon in the place and the mayor is a Social Democrat. Now and again a man is seen on the streets in a state of intoxication; where he obtains liquor is a puzzle-but he gets it. The testimony is that an earnest effort is made by those in authority to enforce the law against the sale of intoxicants. Municipalities in Massachusetts vote annually over the question of license. The people of Brockton, who have the franchise, decided a year or two ago to license liquor saloons by a majority of thirteen votes. After a year's experience the voters decided by a majority of 2,000 against the license system. It is not probable that Brockton will try the licensing of liquor stores again soon. Even with a man now and again on the streets in an intoxicated state, the moral condition of the community is much better than when there were open saloons. By their fruits the saloon is condemned. I heard John J. Ingalls, of Kansas, say, some years ago, at Prohibition Park, Staten Island, New York, that NOT ONE WORD CAN BE SAID IN FAVOR OF THE LIQUOR BUSINESS, and Mr. Ingalls was not a Prohibitionist. In the same speech he maintained that "prohibition does not prohibit "

Haverhill, Mass., has a mayor who is a Social Democrat as well as Brockton. I saw a man a few days ago in a hotel, in the last-named city, with a Debs button on the lapel of his coat. Eagene V. Debs will receive a few votes for President of the United States, no doubt, in these cities. Haverhill has a population of probably 35,000 and is a manufacturing town. It is said that the two gentlemen who are in the executive chairs of these cities are proving their fitness for the responsible positions to which they were elected. They are good men and free from fanaticism. No radical reforms are attempted. The mayor of Brockton worked as a plumber at the time of his election. The late Edward Bellamy seems to be an authority with this variety of Democrats. His books, "Looking Backward" and "Equality," are the publications to which one is referred who desires to know the aims of the Social Democrats. It is pretty certain that all Democrats who desire office will be "Social" from this time until after the November election, and so also will Republicans be who hunger for official plums. But this ought to be said of the members of the Social Democratic party-the rank and file, as far as I have met them-they are in dead earnest in their desire to bring in better economic conditions.

A modern shoeshop is a place of great interest to a man from the agricultural parts of our country. The making of a shoe is a complicated process to the uninitiated. In a factory of 500 workers it is probable that not a man knows how to make a shoe. He knows how to make his part of a shoe, but nothing more. The work is almost all done by machinery-machinery which seems to possess a degree of intelligence. In any great modern manufacturing establishment one's appreciation of the inventive faculty of the latter-day American is marvelously enhanced. But the condition of the operatives is even more interesting than is the machinery in the factory. The effect of the work must, in many cases, be intellectually dwarfing. The wages of many of the working men are comparatively small; their hours of toil are frequently long. Generally, too, they are not so healthy in appearance as are outof-door workers. Notwithstanding, there is no such bitterness of feeling toward men of property as in some parts of the West. The fact is, in New England, as in every part of our country, the majority of those who are rich began life at the bottom of the financial ladder, and the intelligent, self-respecting workingman cherishes the hope that at sometime he himself may be a capitalist. Why not? Other men have gone from the bottom to the top, and why may not this man?

Referring to the problem of improved social and economic conditions—one of the most encouraging signs of the times is the wide-spread interest in the study of questions relating to the physical, intellectual, social, moral and spiritual improvement of men. This means ultimate improvement. In fact, the condition of the laboring man in the United States to-day is better than at any time in the past. If you doubt the correctness of this statement, read Mc-Master's "History of the People of the United States," published by the Appletons. As discouraging as the situation sometimes appears, progress has been made and the outlook is encouraging.

It is certain that we are learning to live together more peacefully and helpfully. The fraternity taught by Jesus will yet be realized as a fact in the history of the race. The social teaching of the Son of God will dominate men. There is more in the first two words of the Lord's Prayer to improve the lives of men in their business relations and experiences than can be found in the words in all the platforms of all the political parties in this year of grace, 1900. The words "Our Father" mean that all men are brothers. When we really learn this lesson we will seek each other's welfare. The capitalist will then consider the welfare of the laborer and the so-called workingman will consider the interests of the capitalist. To learn the lessons contained in these words will lead different classes of men to bear each other's burdens and in this way fulfill the law of Christ. The real friend of the poor man is the one who faithfully and freely preaches the doctrine of the Christ. A true Church of Christ in a given community is the best friend of the workingman-it is also the friend of the capitalist.

There is a good congregation of Disciples of Christ in Brockton. The place of meeting is on Crescent Street, near Lyman. There are from seventy to seventy-five members. The location of the chapel is good; the ground on which it stands is paid for. There is a small debt on the building, but the church is not embarrassed thereby. Soon plans will be put in operation looking to the erection of the main building. In the course of a year or two, unless some unforeseen event should interfere, a house of worship will stand on Crescent Street with sittings for 400 people, bearing on its front the name CHURCH OF CHRIST. The pluck of New England Disciples excites my highest admiration. They have conviction and courage. Their desire to understand the Bible is unusual. To teach such persons is a privilege. Their questions excite thought in the mind of the teacher. On their faces is an expression of inquiry as they listen to sermons and Bible expositions. There is not a more interesting place in which to work than New England.

G. A. Reinl is our preacher in Brockton. He is one of my New York boys. He was ordained in May, 1895, by the church on West 56th Street. He has been in Brockton more than four years. He was born in New York more than 30 years ago. His father was a German, his mother a native of Austria. Before Bro. Reinl became acquainted with the Disciples of Christ he had his eye on the ministry in the Presbyterian Church. For five years he was active in a mission sustained by the Birch Presbyterian Church, Dr. Van Dyke, pastor, in New York. To obtain an education he has labored diligently. For a time Bro. Reinl lived in the West. He graduated from the Parkville Academy, Parkville, Mo., thirty miles east of Kansas City. The school of Ashley S. Johnson, by correspondence, has enabled him to understand the Bible better. While he was yet in New York he listened to lectures in the Union Theological Seminary. Bro. Reinl preached a little more than a year and a half for the Green Point Mission in Brooklyn. It is his purpose to study in Boston University next year. To secure their chapel the Disciples in Brockton, with their young preacher in the lead, have practiced real self-denial. Do you wish to help them to complete their building? This is a good place to put some of the Lord's money.

Brockton is proud of her hospital, and well she may be; and Disciples are proud of the fact that Miss Grace B. Beattie, one of their number, a native of Prince Edward Island, is at the head of it; and well may they rejoice in this fact. She is a noble woman.

B. B. T.

Chicago Letter.

June was a month remarkable in Chicago for very cool weather and the Prohibition Convention. A year ago the thermometer registered 90 in the shade the first week; this year it did not rise above 86 on the warmest day, and blankets were in requisition every night. Church attendance in all parts of the city was uniformly good through the whole month. Lake Michigan is a great equalizer of temperature; it moderates the heat of summer and the cold of winter. But there are days when the lake slumbers, and the hot breath of the "sunny South" coquettes with the sky-scraping buildings, and sets the telephone wires to humming: "There'll be a hot time in the old town tonight." In other words, Chicago is not an ideal summer resort -- not vet.

The problem of religious work for the summer is up again. It is one problem in one section of the city, and an altogether different problem in another. Its solution depends upon the character of the man who studies it. For example, Johnston Myers, of Impanuel Baptist Church, like Dr. John Mathews, formerly of St. Louis, does not take a summer vacation. He crowds on more steam, varies his methods somewhat and succeeds in reaching the people and doing good. This year his colleague, Dr. P. S. Henson, of First Baptist Church, goes to Europe and leaves a pulpit supply. To enable him to make the trip and rest both mind and heart-for Mrs. Henson died quite rscently-the church presented him with a purse of $1,100. Query: Is this an exclusively Baptist practice, or is it in accord with New Testament teaching? Doubtless both these men can easily justify their procedure. This much can be affirmed at all hazards: a vacation for preacher, merchant, manufacturer, clerk, stenographer or any other worker, at some season of the year, is a wise investment of time and money.

It is not one bit sagacious, and therefore not admirable, to run blindly on with the conventional service in a hot audience room, where the perspiring, fanning few sit heroically, wondering how much longer the sermon will last! The wheels may be kept going, but they will find no grist. We submit that some of us have lived here long enough to know that the summer is hot: that religious zeal and the efficiency of stereotyped methods decline as the mercury rises; and now we should have sense enough to demand new methods and resourcefulness enough to invent them. Yet the proposition to build a roof-garden on a new church is taken as a bit of vulgar sensationalism! Why, bless you, the devil has had the roof-garden lo these many years! He uses it along with other hot-weather devices for his purposes; let us use it for ours. The same house can be used for revelry, or for worship; the same pen can sign a pardon, or a warrant for execution. The same method of reaching the people can be used for their demoralization or for their salvation. If the preacher finds that his audience has gone off on wheels, let the stupid old saint put his choir on wheels and go after them! If he does not, the lost audience may continue hereafter as they do here-to scorch!

The writer was once invited to speak at a Labor Day celebration, on Sunday afternoon, in a beergarden. He accepted with alacrity, only sorry that such opportunities were few. An out-door service is inspiring. The stars shining afar lend majesty, the winds are musical and the trees and grasses add many a silent charm. Truly, "the groves were God's first temples," and an annual return to these primitive places of worship, with their wide aisles, lofty arches and conscious ease and freedom will help to keep our religion fresh and natural, reverent and inspirational.

When the Massachusetts delegation to the Prohibition Convention entered the hall bearing a huge canteen on a pole, and flags with "Anticanteen" printed on them, the convention stood on chairs, threw hats and banners into the air and yelled as if it had elected its ticket. If it should turn out that there is very much of such sentiment in the country the present admisistration will rue it. The results of the convention have already been before the public several weeks. Judging from present indications this party of reform will poll a larger vote than ever.

Dr. Hiram Van Kirk has gone East for a few weeks before leaving for his new post of duty as dean of the Berkeley Bible Seminary, California. Dr. E. S. Ames is an instructor in Chicago University for the summer. Angus McKinnon, office editor of the Christian Century, spent last week in Des Moines and Kansas City. W. M. Forrest made a recent trip through Kentucky. Chas. Clayton Morrison, pastor Monroe Street, has entered the University. FARNK G. TYRRELL.

The Land of Evangeline.

Monday morning, June 11, I left my home and loved ones at Muncie, Ind., and began my long journey to Acadia. Having four hours to wait at Union City, Ind., I spent them very pleasantly with Bro. M. Small and his interesting family. Thirteen years ago I ordained Bro. Small in Liverpool, England, and am glad to know that he is now so able a preacher and that he ministers to so large a church as at Union City. At 3 P. M. I arrived at Columbus, O., and lectured at night in the Central Church on "Spiritualism." Bro. R. W. Abberley is the pastor of that church, and perhaps there is no abler preacher among the young men in our brotherhood. I have special reasons for loving him, for he is one of my spiritual children. I baptized him in Liverpool, England, and ordained him in Lincoln, Neb. My time with him and his consecrated family was all too short.

Among the many interesting people that I met in Columbus was one of my former parishioners from Omaha, and the father and mother of our talented E. T. Williams. They were very uneasy about their son in China. Let us trust that God will care for our missionaries in these troublous times.

Tuesday night, June 12, I lectured in Ashland, O., and spent some delightful hours with old friends. Bro. S. V. Williams is the efficient pastor at Ashland, and is much beloved by the people. He is a son of the pioneer, S. V. Williams, of Southern Illinois, and wears worthily the mantle of his father.

Wednesday morning I resumed my journey via Cleveland and Buffalo, reaching Boston at 10 A. M., Thursday. The scenery in Western Massachusetts is indescribably beautiful. Excepting the Highlands of Scotland, I have never seen anything so beautiful as the Berkshire hills. My stay in Boston was too brief for me to call upon any of our members, but I spent some time in reviewing familiar scenes in the city. Twenty years ago, when I was a very young preacher, I spent six weeks in Boston, and May 23, 1880, we organized a church of thirteen members, that has since changed and grown into all our churches in and about Boston, and has refuted the old superstition of the unlucky number.

Nineteen years ago Bro. F. N. Calvin and I started the New England Evangelist in Worcester, Mass., and published it for one year in the interest of the New England mission work. But these were long years ago, and such changes have come that I passed through Worcester and Boston as a stranger in a strange land.

But the most difficult thing was to pass through

Portland, Me., without stopping. This beautiful city was for two years our home, and memories came crowding in thick and fast when, at 11 P.M., we came into the Union Station, just below the Western Promenade. We lived in Portland when the Christian Endeavor Society was organized there, and I have preached many times in Dr. Clark's old church at the corner of May and Danforth Streets. He had outgrown it, and they built him a new church. Our brethren leased the old building and refitted it, and I assisted them in their first meeting in it. But adieu these memories. The King's business requires haste, and I must go on. We passed through Brunswick, Gardiner, Augusta, Waterville, Bangor and Oldtown, and reached Vanceboro at 8 Friday morning. Brunswick is the seat of the famous colllege where Longfellow and Hawthorne were educated, and was the home of Harriet Beecher Stowe when she wrote "Uncie Tom's Cabin," and Oldtown was the early abiding-place of two of our well known preachers—George Campbell and J. W. Robbins. When a New England evangelist I held meetings at Gardiner and Vanceboro.

At 9 A. M. we passed into New Brunswick and reached St. John at noon. At the station I was welcomed by brethren L. A. Miles and George F. Barnes, the president and treasurer of the Mari-time Mission Board. At the hospitable home of Bro. Miles I found every comfort that a tired traveler could need. St. John is a very interesting city to a Western man. We have one good church and a flourishing mission there, and it is the headquarters of the Maritime Mission work, and of The Christian, the provincial paper. At 7 A. M. Saturday I boarded the steamer

"Commonly Used Drug."

DR. WOOD REFERS TO COFFEE.

Dr. Jas. Wood, of Philadelphia, speaking of the effect of coffee, says: "These symptoms bear silent but impressive witness to the terrible injury which is being wrought by this commonly used drug."

If health is worth anything it is worth looking after carefully. Any person who dricks coffee and has any sort of ailment that can be traced back, through even a very long line of disturbances, to the nervous system, may depend upon it that coffee is the cause of the difficulty.

The drug contained in coffee has a direct action upon the nerves, differing in different people. The effect may show in one person in the shape of dyspepsia, in another person in weak eyes, in another, palpitation of the heart, in another, kidney or bowel trouble, in another, bad complexion or eruptions on the skin, in another, a general feeling of lassitude and weakness at times. All of these and a long list of other disturbances come directly from a disturbed nervous system, where the nerve matter-the delicate gray substance that is contained in the nerve centers and in the brain-has been destoyed, to an extent, and not replaced from the food.

That is the exact work of coffee with highly organized people. Such people feel the loss of coffee for a time, unless something is given to take its place. This is the mission of Postum Food Coffee; it not only furnishes, when properly made, a delicate coffee flavor in itself, but carries with it the phosphate of potash and other elements required by Nature to rebuild the nervous system and reconstruct the tearing down work that has been going on from the use of "drug coffee." (We use the words "drug coffee" because all regular coffee is in reality a drug; and its continued use will, in ninety cases out of a hundred, bring on trouble of some kind.)

Postum Food Coffee is sold by all first-class grocers.

Cincinnati Letter

It was the good fortune of the writer to be sent on a mission to the larger colleges during the month previous to their commencements. Everywhere there were signs of increase. No previous year has seen anything like this last in attendance or financial prosperity. Half a million does not seem much in these days of millions, yet it has been large for us, reckoned on the percentage basis, and is larger still when it is looked upon as a prophecy of an awakened consciousness of our greatest need as a people. Most of these schools are making for stronger courses also. It takes money to provide a high grade course. No class of men are more truly missionary so far as financial sacrifice is concerned than our college professors. Many of them are sticking to their posts when the publi: schools would gladly pay them onehalf more. It is time that we need quality with our increasing quantity. Mere numbers do not make a great college. The popular normal school can get numbers easily with its short and rush course. The real test of a school is a graduate. Larger endowment will grant larger salaries, bring more highly educated men, cut teaching hours and in every way add to efficiency. The Disciples must needs train scholars before they take first place among the Chistian bodies, and that means the generation now ready for college must receive the instruction.

A WORKING BOYS' HOME.

Boys growing out of one of our down-town miscions within the last few months gives its added exhortation from another field the Disciples have scarcely touched—that of institutional philanthrophy. The Home now has about thirty boys in residence and turns others away almost every day. No one can tell the extent of its good done. The The homeless boy in a large city is, indeed, in pitiable circumstances. They come from box, alley and saloon and find a home and a motherly heart-and whose heart responds to a mother more than a boy's. Many of them need that worse than clothes. The Home is now chartered with a board consisting of good business men and a minority of preachers. Its fruits guarantee its

THE SCHOOL OF PASTORAL HELPERS.

The latest star in our educational firmament is the School of Pastoral Helpers, being inaugurated by Bro. A. M. Harvuot of the Central Church. If inquiries are any index, its success is insured from incipiency. This project has long been maturing in Bro. Harvuot's heart and his experience well fits both him and his field for the work. This city affords excellent laboratory advantages, and the practical will be most emphasized. Every young lady applying should have at least the equivalent of a high school education and be sure she has a heart for humanity. Three young ladies received instruction during the spring and demonstrated the practicability of methods proposed. The cost to the students will be moderate.

NEWS NOTES.

Geo. A. Miller, of Covington, and A. C. Gray, of Mt. Healthy, are spending their vacation studying at the University of Chicago. F. M. The Home Board voted in favor of aiding the work so promisingly begun by a few ardent spirits lately ir Newark, N. J. B. W. Huntsman, of Australia, graduated at Kentucky University in June and immediately took up the work of the Fourth Church. He will also oversee the Delta Mission. Our missionary year closes with July 31st, and the books will close that day. This is to urge the churches and ministry that have not sent offerings to favor us at once and remit to our treasurer. J. P. Darst, Peoria.

Our state jubilee convention will be held at Bloomington, Oct. 2, 3, 4, and we have secured the great Coliseum building that will seat over three thousand people. We expect five thousand Disciples during the sessions. The railway associations will probably give us a one-fare rate and we trust that our ministry will generously advertise. Programs and announcements will be sent

Unless you send your statistical report this month to your district secretary your church cannot be properly represented in our yearbook.

Those of the ministry that are not properly represented in our yearbook will do all concerned a favor by informing me at once. I'do my best to keep track of removals as shown in our papers, but cannot make our list accurate unless brethren aid me. It only costs a postal card to tell of a removal. To preachers that have come into the state I shall be grateful if they will so inform me. I want your name correct and you will want your railway certificate. Help me and yourself, please. J. FACTS ABOUT CHINA.

We recently published a booklet, entitled "Facts About China," by Wm. Remfrey Hunt, of Chu Cheo, China. Mr. Hunt has been for many years a resident of Central China, and is thoroughly ac-quainted with the country and its people. The following are some of his topics:

Hiram Jubilee Commencement.

Hiram has enjoyed the honor and pleasure of celebrating the fiftieth anniversary of her existence as an institution of learning and the thirtythird commencement of her college life.

This commencement season was certainly a jubilee in every way. It was a season of great rejoicing. An unusully large number of the friends of the institution were present from all parts of the land, and never were they so happy as when it became evident that the Jubilee Endowment Movement was an assured success. It was the time, too, of liberation from past limitations, especially of a financial nature.

Hiram, like all of our colleges, has had to contend constantly with the financial problem. Her life has been a struggle for existence. The success of the Jubilee Endowment Movement will release her from this struggle to a great extent and enable her to give more of her care and energy to the intellectual and moral development of her student life.

The week opened with the usual commencement services of Sunday: The baccalaureate sermon, preached by Pres. Zollars; the ordination service at 3 P. M., conducted by R. Moffett and Prof. McDiarmid, and the anniversary of the Christian Associations in the evening.

On Monday evening the literary societies held their commencement exercises. These were marked by great enthusiasm on account of the large number of visiting alumni present.

Tuesday was undergraduate day. Besides speeches by representative students addresses were made by A. B. Philputt, of Indianapolis, Ind., and Pres. C. L. Loos, of Lexington, Ky. Both addresses showed carefulness of preparation and were delivered with great vigor and earnestness.

Wednesday was alumni day. Addresses were made by Roland Nichols, of Worchester, Mass.; Frank W. Norton, of Niagara Falls, N. Y.; F. A. Henry, of Cleveland, O.; W. M. Forest, of Ann Arbor, Mich.; Miss Cora Allen, of Cincinnati, O., and J. K. Baxter, of Mt. Vernon, O. An original poem was read by Miss Adelaide Frost.

This was the most enjoyable alumni meeting that the writer has ever attended. There was enough reminiscence to make the fellowship delightful and enough sound, sober thought on the educational problem to impress all present with its magnitude and importance.

Thursday was commencement day proper and the great day of the feast. It was without a doubt the greatest day in Hiram's history.

At an early hour the Tabernacle, enlarged on purpose for the occasion, was filled to overflowing. A considerable portion of the day was spent in raising money. At the morning session Pres. Zollars divulged just enough of his knowledge of the situation to create in the audience a feeling of assurance that the endowment movement had been a success. The last thing in the afternoon he stated the full results of the movement. These were far beyond the expectations of the most hopeful friends of the institution. The movement began with an effort to raise $250,000. The president was able to state that $225,000 had been raised.

The speakers of the day were J. A. Lord, of the Christian Standard, Hon. T. W. Phillips, of Newcastle, Pa., Pres. Loos, of Lexington, Ky., and J. H. Garrison, of the Christian-Evangelist. A jubilee poem was read by Mirs. Jessie Brown Pounds, of Cleveland, O.

The college sends out into the world this year the largest graduating class in its history. The graduates, numbered 32 from the regular classical, philosophical and scientific courses, 17 from the literary course and two from the conservatory of music

Friday was eclectic or pioneer day, in many respects the most enjoyable of all. The program consisted of an historical address by B. A. Hinsdale, of Ann Arbor, Mich., and five-minute speeches by the pioneers of the institution. A large number of the old friends were present, too many to mention here. Their speeches were full of pathos, humor and reminiscence and gave the young man a much better acquaintance with the early struggles and life of the institution than could be obtained in any other way.

The inability of Prof. H. L. Willett and Gov. F. M. Drake to fill their places upon the program was greatly regretted by all. Prof. Eugene Feuchtinger, the head of our musical department, furnished the music for the entire program and deserves great credit for the admirable manner in which he did his work.

The only tinge of sadness in the whole commencement was that caused by the sudden and and unexpected death of Prof. Pierson, which occurred the week before. Prof. Pierson, had been connected with Hiram as student and teacher for twenty-five years. He had a wide acquaintance, not only among the friends of Hiram, but also throughout the state as instructor, lecturer and preacher. His funeral services were held on Monday of commencement week.

Prof. Wakefield, his lifelong friend, delivered a very beautiful and appropriate memorial address. Short addresses were made by Prof. Newington, a classmate of Prof. Pierson's, Prof. Bancroft and others.

The alumni have inaugurated a movement to endow a chair of English in memory of Prof. Pierson.

The college will strive to secure an able and experienced man to fill his place on the faculty by the opening of next year's work.

The friends of 1 iram are delighted with the success of the jubilee commencement. They feel that it marks the beginning of a new epoch in Hiram history.

Feeding for Health.

DIRECTIONS BY A FOOD EXPERT.

A complete change in food makes a complete change in body. Therefore if you are ailing in any way, the surest road back to health is to change your diet. Try the following breakfast for ten days and mark the result:

Two soft boiled eggs. (If you have a weak stomach, boil the eggs as follows: Put two eggs into a pint tin cup of boiling water, cover and set off the stove. Take out in nine minutes; the whites will be the consistency of cream and partly digested. Don't change the directions in any particular) Some fruit, cooked or raw, cooked preferred, a slice of toast, a little butter, four heaping teaspoons of Grape-Nuts with some cream, a cup of properly boiled Postum Food Coffee.

The Grape-Nuts breakfast food is fully and scientifically cooked at the factory, and both that and the Postum Coffee have the diastase (that which digests the starchy part) developed in the manufacture. Both the food and the coffee, therefore, are predigested and assist, in a natural way, to digest the balance of the food. Lunch at noon the same.

For dinner in the evening use meat and one or two vegetables. Leave out the fancy desserts. Never overeat. Better a little less than too much.

If you can use health as a means to gain success in business or in a profession, it is well worth the time and attention required to arrange your diet to accomplish the result.

Golden Rule Side of Christianity.

The Disciples of Christ, dating from early in the present century, have had a remarkable growth in numbers and influence. Their influence has been due more to the observance of the Commission than to that of the Golden Rule.

"Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you" fell into the background early and persists in staying there despite the efforts of many who wish to see the Restoration go on until a more symmetrical development of the "Ancient Order" is reached. With these the writer would work and wait, hoping for times more propitious, when the excitement of outward acquisitions allure less and that attainment of calm, pure and deep character—like a river wide —bear upon its bosom a mighty army heavenward, helpful to humanity, having the Golden Rule inscribed upon its banner, wrought with golden threads of love in every heart and proved invincible everywhere. Excelsior!

It may be impracticable to begin this Restoration movement generally, or insist upon the importance of it, without some special experiments—like Sheldon's Daily. Apply and IMPROVE.

The Millennial Harbinger, 1838, page seven, has a few words of special importance and worthy to be read and reflected upon by all who would see the Church of Christ "setting the pace" for "greater things" early in the coming century:

"The morality of this age, like its doctrinal views of the new institution, is far below that standard of Christian excellence propounded by the precepts and example of the divine Founder of the religion of immortality. Jesus intended that all men should know his disciples, not by the singularity of their profession, but by the superior purity of their lives—the heavenborn excellence of their characters. He intended that they should appear worthy of the renovating hope of the resurrection of the just as well as cherish it, and boast of it before the world.

"Most unfortunately, both for the church and the world, the attention of Christendom has for ages been turned away from the sweet enjoyments of Christianity, its pure and peaceable and holy temper, its divine intimacies, its holy communions, its hallowed conversations and its guileless, spotless innocence of behavior, to the weak and beggarly elements of speculative, scholastic and polemic theology. . While men are all their lives seeking or getting religion, or hungering and thirsting after excitements, rather than after righteousness and true holiness, they cannot have better morality or religion than such as we daily witness."

The influence of the church varies, and sometimes and in some localities seems to prevail for good through the wise and steadfast adherence to genuine Bible teaching and the Christian daily walk and conversation of many of its members. But too often and in many places the church has no great influence for good upon the world. It has live leaders and lively services, up to date in all respects. "One thing thou lackest."

The world wants a good time. It is selfish. It sees and enjoys rivalry—"competition is the life of trade." It pays and prays well for fine church buildings, believes with Gen. Anderson that different churches (sects) are beneficial. "They spur one another up." Is there no need to bring up the reserves? Who can undertake this better than the Disciples of Christ? And the time is at hand. Even as 96 years ago. In many places there are soul-longings for the sincere return to UNITY OF FAITH and the PRACTICE of BENEVOLENCE—HUMANITY.

The University of Adversity.

ERSKINE.

There are many universities in America from which the privileged ones may graduate. But to-day I want to speak on a university so large that it would require a lifetime to read all the names of its students, which has a net enrollment of 1,500,000,000 students.

I never saw any one with either a diploma or certificate of graduation from this school. It is a vast labyrinth of classrooms, with an expert faculty fully equipped in each of their respective lines. Its curriculum embraces an infinite number of various experiences. Its tuition fees can not be paid in legal tender, currency coins nor negatiable notes of any description, no matter what bank or government stands in back of it. The cradle is its entree and the grave its diploma.

There are no forty-minute recitations in this school. In this place of education there is no need of a Waterbury or an Elgin movement watch, to which you with impatient eagerness look up to see if the time is up. In this university forty minutes never comes.

The faculty of this university cannot boast of a million-dollar building donated by some generous friend, but its building is the edifice of the human soul. The text books are not studied by the brain-power within a certain time, but it is studied by heartpower for a lifetime.

In this school you won't find the vexing text-books of Kant, Hegel, Schliermacher, Plato, Aristotle, Butler or Berkeley, but the text-books are within the comprehension of all those who are in the school; they are the lessons of life.

This is the university of adversity, the college of experience, the high school of life. The course leads to the degree of perfection. Adversity is the mold in which character is formed; it is the whetstone of life, the dumbbells of common experience, the gymnasium of history.

The optimism of adversity is the doctrine which lights up like a torch-the path of duty. To be well rounded it is necessary to burn out the personal dross by the sure fire of adversity. The more gold is burned the better the quality the less alloy and dross you will be likely to find.

When the cutting pressure of trouble comes upon us, remember, we are becoming diamonds, and the greater the cutting the better the diamond.

Trouble makes a man out of us -the man we ought to be. The best man in the world to-day is not living easy. We must remember that rich men are not, as a rule, the best (morally) men. Experience is the discipline book of humanity. What the world needs to-day is not intellectual giants, but disciplined giants. Men who know by practice rather than by theory, although the theory might contain the principles of practice; yet it is not the practice itself. Experience is the horseman that breaks youth in the ways of the world.

There are many in the world who exceedingly deplore all the suffering in this world. They are called, philosophically, pessimists. There is no cloud but what they can see, and a cloud as small as a man's hand would mar all the pleasure of looking at the heavens. They would forget to look with admiration at the silver lining which the sun casts while reigning behind the clouds.

The road to pleasure is peril and pain; no satisfaction without suffering. Napoleon compressed this wonderful doctrine into four words: "No egg, no omelet," meaning that without the breaking of an egg omelet could not be made.

Have you ever thought that all our standard works were wrought in perilous times? Blind Milton wrote Paradise Lost and Paradise Regained. Exiled Dante wrote immortal works under banishment. Prisoner John Bunyan, while in the Bedford jail, wrote Pilgrim's Progress. Fontenelle, Voltaire, Cowper, Cobden, Sir James Graham, Lord Beaconsfield, Goldsmith, Bentham Addison became the fixed stars of literature by failure in something else.

Madam Guvon became the sweetest character in the French prison in her time. Camoeus, the great poet, died in the pauper home, and this was the inscription on his gravestone: "Here lies Luis de Camoeus; he excelled all the poets of his time; he lived poor and miserable and he died so. 1579.

The world's best music was born out of the womb of sorrow. Mozart's Requiem was composed while the eminent musician was in a fatal disease. Palsied Handel made his name immortal. Beethoven was stone deaf; Schubert died with only sixtythree florins in his possession.

Michael Angelo sculptured the most beautiful ideas while being persecuted. It

The Value Of Reputation.

Then, since suffering is so beneficial, let us suffer, not because we have too, but because we are made better by it.

If "a good name is rather to be chosen than great riches," how important, when buying a piano, that you get one with a good name from a reliable house-that will last an ordinary lifetime and give you no trouble or expense.

As there are so many worthless makes on the market that are dear at any price, we would advise our readers befor purchasing to investigate the merits of the Jesse French, Starr and Richmond Pianos-the three leading and most popular makes in America, made by the Jesse French Piano & Organ Co., St Louis, Mo., one of the largest and most responsible firms in the country. Prices moderate—terms reasonable, and best of all you will get an instrument that will last and give satisfaction with the privilege of seeing and testing it before any money is paid.

A. P. ATEN.

So soft and low the breezes blow, Off from the land of beauty straying; Gently their odorous breathings flow, Wantonly with each pennon playing. Loose the cable and set the sail, High up the loyal colors nail;

With joyous songs on the voyage starting. Adieus be waved in careless parting.

So swift and sure the ship glides on Out on the bright blue waters gleaming; Life is a joy and cares all gone. On each are the happiest visions beaming No fear of the gathering storm-cloud's wrath, No nameless terror for them it hath,

No dread of the heavens cleft asunder By lightning flash or deep-toned thunder.

So wide the waste, so high the wave And bitter the tempest fiercely blowing; So deep is the opening ocean grave,

So dense is the darkness around them growing.
"Too late! too late!" is the wailing cry That pitiful pierces the midnight sky;

No power can save from the storm-tossed ocean And the billowy waves in wild commotion.

So desolate the rocky shore
Where fragments lie of the good ship Pleasure, In sound of the sad and solemn roar

Of the tossing sea that holds her treasure. Careless the hearts that sailed so free Out on thy peaceful waves, O sea; But cold are the hearts beneath thy breaking,

Wrapped in the sleep that knows no waking.

"Living Epistles."

T. H. EDWARDS.

To be living epistles we must exemplify a life that shows Christian activity transforming the individual characters so we will possess a vital force that should grow with a spiritual intensity each day, week and year as the fleeting moments speed on the swift wings of time.

To be lights in the world that will shine on and on until the perfect day, we must be imbued with that wisdom which becomes effectual by a sincere and honest investigation of the Word of God, for we are told to be "wise as serpents, yet harmless as doves;" that kind which emanates from a spirit of love the world can see and approve of with convincing proof that is the real Spirit of Christ in influencing the world to accept of the Master's tidings and to obey his commands; but a mere cursory or parrot-like perusal of the Bible will never fit us for that drawing power among men Christians should

Paul says to Timothy: "Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that need not be ashamed, rightly dividing the Word of truth."

It is surprising when one comes to listen to or interrogate the majority of Sundayschool teachers to find how poorly prepared they are to elucidate the lesson to their classes, and consequently fail to make any lasting impression upon their ears or hearts. Why? Because they do not study to gain what Paul exhorts Timothy to possess; they do not realize their responsibility to God.

Now there is a difference between wisdom and knowledge; one may know that which is debasing and hurtful, altogether lacking in wisdom; some are wise in their own conceits. which detracts instead of attracts. wisdom from God tends to make one humble, obedient, kind, just and reverential. If we possess such virtues, then it necessarily follows we are living epistles. Wise persons will hear and always strive to be wiser by applying their minds to attain the greatest good, to fully understand, to know whereof they speak. The fool thinks he knows it all; men like Newton, Franklin, Socrates, Galileo, Darwin, Huxley, Herbert Spencer and others of profound knowledge, learn from the simplest things, for they feel they know nothing in comparison to what may be found out. The sophist claims to have attained all. The man that has no reverence for the Creator lacks real true religion.

There is too little heed paid to the true worship and holy reverence for the Deity at this day. There must be a higher and holier conception of "our Father who art in heaven" to be living epistles-read and known of all men. Are we as professing Christians so living, and are we satisfied with our present efforts in what we are doing for Christ and humanity? Are we as Disciples, who in a peculiar sense claim to have no other creed or doctrine for our guide and rule of conduct but thus saith the Word-are we a great light set upon a hill? Are we accomplishing in accordance with our pretentions and opportunities what we may and should for the upbuilding of Zion and the kingdom of Christ upon earth? If not, then why do we boast?

Let the reader, whoever he or she may be, throw the searchlight of God's Word upon their hearts and see if they be living epistles according to the teaching and example of the great teacher, the perfect Christ.

Quincy, Ill.

The fire which destroyed the immense Swamp Root medicine plant of Dr. Kilmer & Co., July 1, was the most disastrous which has ever occurred in Binghampton. However, the Kilmers resumed business next morning, though not at the old stand, which is a heap of smouldered ashes. While the firemen were yet pouring water on the burn-ning Chenango street establishment, the Kilmers were arranging to do business somewhere else.

That this great industry might not be crippled for a moment, through the courtesy of other prominent firms and citizens, the large factory and adjoining buildings on South street were va-cated for the benefit of the Swamp Root people, and possession was taken immediately, and here, by Monday, July 8, this new, temporary factory will be turning out Swamp Root, the great Kidney Remedy, in quantities of about 60,000 bottles per day, and in two or three weeks' time the full capacity of more than four times that amount will be produced. The immense demand for Swamp Root will thus in no way be interfered with.

On the old site, with adjoining property which has just been purchased, will be erected immediately an absolutely fire-proof six story structure, plans for which have been nearly completed.

The Bear Lion's Sister.

J. BRECKENRIDGE ELLIS.

This week we begin a continued story, "The Lion's Sister," written by Mr. W. M. Thackery, which I have arranged, not changing any of his words (for Mr. T. was a first-rate author), but leaving out a great deal, and putting pieces together that Mr. T. scattered along as he pleased. The story will run about two months, if I am not mistaken, and I am very sure you never read it before. Save all the papers. The style is charming, as you will now observe.

When the king of Paflagonia died he left his brother regent of the kingdom and guardian of his orphan infant, Giglio. The unfaithful regent took no sort of regard of the late king's will, but had himself proclaimed sovereign of Pafigonia under the title of King Valoroso XXIV. Prince Giglio, by reason of his tender age, did not feel the loss of his crown and empire. As long as he had plenty of toys and sweetmeats, a holiday five times a week, and a horse and gun to go shooting when he grew a little older, and above all, the company of the king's only daughter, poor Giglio was perfectly contented. This only child, Princess Angelica, was a paragon in her parents' eyes and in her own. It was said she could play the most difficult pieces at sight, that she she knew every date in the history of Paflagonia and every other country, that she knew English, French, Hebrew, Latin and Crim Tartar. And now I must tell you about the accomplishments for which the princess had such a wonderful character. Clever, Angellica was, but as idle as possible. Play at sight, indeed! She could only play one or two pieces and pretend that she had never seen them before: she could answer half a dozen dates, but then you must be sure to ask the right ones. As for her languages, I doubt if she knew more than a few phrases in each, for all her pretense; and as for her embroidery and drawing, she showed beautiful specimens, it is true; but who did them?

One day, when the Princess Angelica was quite a little girl, she was walking in the garden of the palace with her governess holding a parasol over her head to keep her sweet complexion from the freckles, and Angelica was carrying a bun to feed the swans in the royal pond. They had not reached the pond when there came toddling toward them such a funny little girl. She had a great quantity of hair blowing about her chubby cheeks, and looked as if she had not been washed or combed for ever so long. She wore a bit of a cloak and had only one shoe on.

"You little wretch, who let you in here?" asked the governess."

"Dive me dat bun," said the little girl; "me hungy."

"Hungy! what is that?" asked Princess Angelica, and gave the child the bun.

"O, princess!" says the governess, "how good, how kind you are! You to give her the whole of your bun!"

"I didn't want it," said Angelica.

"But you are a darling little angel, all the same," says the governess.

"Yes, I know I am," said Angelica. "Dirty little girl, don't you think I am very pret-

"Oh, pooty, pooty!" says the little girl capering about, laughing and singing as she munched her bun. "O, what fun to have a plum bun! how I wis it never was done!" At that Angelica and Giglio and the king, who had come into the garden, laughed very merrily. The little girl ran to the flowerbed and pulling a few polyanthuses and rhododendrons, made a wreath and danced before the king and everybody was delighted.

"Who was your mother, little girl?" said the king.

The little girl said: "Little lion was my brudder, great big lioness my mudder, neber heard of any udder." And she capered on her one shoe, and everybody was exceedingly diverted.

So Angelica said: "My parrot flew out of its cage yesterday, and I don't care for any of my toys, and I think this funny little dirty girl will amuse me. I will take her home and give her some of my old dresses."

"Oh, the generous darling!" says the governess.

"Which I have worn ever so many times and am quite tired of," Angelica went on; "and she shall be my little maid. Will you come with me, little dirty girl?"

The child clapped her hands and said: "Go with you, yes! Have a nice dinner and wear a new dress!" And they all laughed again and took the child to the palace where, when she was washed and combed, she looked as handsome as Angelica, almost. Not that Angelica ever thought so. That the little girl might not become too proud, the governess took her ragged mantle and one shoe and put them in a glass box with a card upon them, upon which was written: "These are the old clothes in which Rosalba was found when the great goodness of her Royal Highness, Princess Angelica, received the little outcast." And the date was added and the box locked up. For awhile Rosalba was a great favorite with the princess. But then the princess got a monkey and afterwards a doll and did not care for Rasalba any more. As she grew older, Rosalba was made a little lady's maid to the princess; and though she had no wages, she worked and mended and put Angelica's hair in papers, and was always up early and to bed late, and at hand when wanted, and in fact a perfect little maid. And so the two girls grew up.

PETER'S CONFESSION AND CHRIST'S REBUKE.*

We are not told how long Jesus tarried in the borders of Tyre and Sidon after healing the daughter of the Syro-Phænician woman, but we may take it for granted that, since he did not find the rest for which he sought in his journey thither, he very soon departed. Instead of returning to Galilee he passed through the country to the north and made his way into the region known as Decapolis, or "The Ten Cities," a tract of country inhabited by a Gentile population, and lying to the north of Perea and northeast of Galilee. His progress was attended with acts of mercy so a bundant as to bring from the grateful people the confession: "He hath done all things well." And these uncircumcised Gentiles, we are told, "glorified the God of Israel." Of the many miracles wrought by the hand of Jesus during this journey but three are described for us in detail. One was the healing of the deaf man in Decapolis, who also had an impediment in his speech. The second was the feeding of four thousand men, besides women and children, a miracle very similar to the one we have recently studied. The third was the healing of the blind man at Bethsaida Julias, on the northeast shore of the Sea of Galilee, near to the spot where the five thousand had been fed.

After his tour through Decapolis Jesus returned to the western shore of the lake, but landed at Magdala, not choosing to return to the cities of Capernanem and Bethsaida, where most of his mighty works had been done. But his Jewish enemies found him here, and the Pharisees and Sadducees, burying for a time their hereditary feud. combined against the Savior and demanded from him a sign to prove his divine authority. He knew it would be useless to grant their request, since all the signs of his wonderful life had failed to produce faith in their hearts. So he told them that no sign should be given them but that which Jonah gave to the wicked city of Nineveh. The ancient prophet preached repentance and righteousness to the Ninevites, and so had Jesus preached to them. The story of Jonah's marvelous experience in being rescued from the living death in the belly of the whale had added emphasis to his proclamation of Jehovah's will. And so would the story of Jesus' death and resurrection bring to the proclamation of truth that emphasis which alone could make it effective for the turning of men's hearts from sin.

Leaving Magdala, the Master and his disciples went by boat to the northeastern shore of the lake, and passing through Bethsaida Julias, where the miracle already referred to was performed, took their way into the region about Cæsarea Philippi. This city lay near the base of the lofty Mount Hermon, whose snowy summit was the glory of the Syrian landscape. Here was located the ancient Phoenician city of Laish, which became known as Dan after its capture by that tribe of Israel. Later still, when it passed again into the hands of the Gentiles, it received the Greek name of Paneas, in honor of the god Pan, to whom a temple was erected. Herod Philip, tetrarch of the province, had recently changed the name to Cæsarea Philippi in honor of the Emperor Tiberias and himself, and had erect d a splendid temple for the worship of his royal master. Near to the city a giant spring burst from the very heart of Hermon and formed one of the chief sources of the River Jordan. It was fitting that at this very spot, whence started the sacred river of Israel's promised land, that confession should first be fully voiced which, repeated by unnumbered myriads as the centuries should come and go, would finally swell into a river of loving praise and testimony, blessing every shore it touched, and touching every shore.

The time had now come to decide finally the attitude of his disciples toward himself. If the two years and more during which they had been his constant companions had failed to reveal to them his true nature and office, it was hopeless to expect them to ever learn. He must know whether they were blind like the Pharisees and Sadducees, whose refusal to recognize him was striking confirmation of the statements afterwards written by the beloved disciple, that the Light of the world shone in the darkness and the darkness comprehended it not. We may not know with what eager and anxious heart Jesus asked his disciples: "Who say ye that I am?" The answer to his first inquiry he doubtless heard with little surprise: "Who do men say I am?" He knew that the multitude had never risen higher in their estimate of him than to reckon him a prophet, like Elijah, Jeremiah or John the Baptist. Had the twelve read aright God's message through him? Peter's reply gave unbounded joy to the Spirit of Jesus: "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." The anointed Savior and the sceptered King was this lowly Nazarene now become to his chosen disciples, and he receives the homage with royal grace. Like a king he bestows a largess upon his faithful subjects, and the glad heart of Peter hears with awe his Master's wo:ds: "Blessed art thou Simon, son of Jonah, for flesh and blood hath not revealed this great truth unto thee, but my Father who is in heaven. And thou art fitly named Peter, a stone, for thou hast just declared the mighty foundation rock upon which my church on earth shall rest, and thou wilt be notable among the living stones which shall first be builded thereupon. Not the unseen world itself, with all its principalities and powers, shall prevail against that church, but it shall stand forever. And, because thou wast first to proclaim this foundation truth, so shalt thou be permitted, as a keeper of the gates, first to invite men to enter in that they may enjoy its heavenly fellowship. Thy word shall be with authority, for my Spirit shall guide thee, so that what thou forbiddest shall be forbidden in heaven, and what thou permittest shall be permitted in heaven." Such, in a very free translation. I take to be the meaning of Jesus' words. The history in the Book of Acts of Apostles is an inspired commentary on this wonderful confession of Peter and the words of Jesus in reply. The church is built upon the Messiahship and Sonship of Jesus, and to Peter was granted the privilege of first proclaiming the terms of salvation to the Jews on the day of Pentecost, and to the Gentiles at the house of Cornelius. To this the apostle refers when he says (Acts 15;7): "The Lord made choice among us that the Gentiles should by my mouth hear the Word of the gospel and believe.'

But it was not yet time for this proclamation. So Jesus tells the disciples to tell no man that he was the Christ. They themselves were not yet prepared for this proclamation. "When their own faith was confirmed beyond all waveling by the mighty fact of his resurrection, when their hearts had been filled with the new Shechinah of God's Holy Spirit and their brows with final consecration had been mitred with pentecostal flame, then, but not till then, would the hour have come for them to go forth and teach all nations that Jesus was indeed the Christ, the Son of the living God."

Before the coronation must come the crucifixion. Hence, Jesus begins to prepare them for this dread ordeal by telling them that his going to

DRUNKENNESS CURED.

An eminent St. Louis physician has given a post tive answer to the oft asked question, is cannot be resisted by a vast number of the human race? The physician in question is Dr. Ozias Paquin, who for years has been a practicing phy sician in the City of St. Louis. He has answered this question by taking five of the worst drunkards that could be found and cured them of all further appetite for intoxicating drinks. The five cases were all beyond middle age and they had sunk into the deepest pit of drunkenness, with the odor of drink about them so obnoxious that it was almost impossible to stand within speaking distance. He not only cured them of all desire for intoxicating drink, but at the same time placed upon their cheek the flush of healtn and into their eyes the light of happiness, and took from their person the odor of whiskey. It was almost a miracle, for he had raised five cases from degradation into the sunshine of health and happiness. Dr. Paquin has cured hundreds of patients who were relapses from other treatments, and in every instance he cured these patients, and they have remained cured for months and years. It can therefore be said that the Paquin Treatment is a permanent cure, and not a temporary one, for the patient never relapses to his former condition. We know of no more humane work being done at the present time than that which Dr. Paquin is doing, and it is the duty of every reader to assist Dr. Ozias Paquin in his noble work, and if any reader has brother, sister, husband, father or friend in whose system lurks the disease of drunkenness, he shou'd at once send their name to Dr. Paquin or see that they either visit or place themselves in communication with the Ozias Paquin Immune Co. Suite 1113 Chemical Bidg., St. Louis. The reader thas does this will certainly be doing a christian act, for no matter how many other treatments have unsuccessfully been tried, the method known as Ozias Paquin Treatment will perfect a cure, dispelling all desirs for drink, and at the same time will place the constitution in a robust and healthy condition. five cases from degradation into the sunshine of Jerusalem would be the occasion of his death. He does not yet tell them that he will be handed over by his own people to the Gentiles, nor that his death will be that of the shameful cross. This added horror he will reveal to them later, when their hearts have become somewhat accustomed to the shadow of the death that now seems impossible. Peter, impetuous as ever, will not have it so, and rebukes his Master for suggesting so unlikely and unworthy an end of all their hopes in him. The reply of the Master is one of the severest ever made to one of his followers: "Get thee behind me, Satan: thou savorest not the things that be of God, but those that be of men!" Peter had fallen from a divine height of faith into a satanic depth of unbelief and presumption. He would not have it that the way of life should be through the low valley of death-that the path of glory should be by way of the grave. His rebuke of the Master had in it the same opposition to divine wisdom and grace that characterized the efforts of Satan in the wilderness to turn the Sa vior aside from the ordered course of duty. Peter must be rudely awaked from his dangerous dream of selfish exaltation as the reward of righteousness. The Lord, therefore, ends the controversy by declaring that the way of self-denial is the only way of following him; and that he alone who is willing to lay down life itself for truth's sake has learned how to live, and has any assurance of the life that is eternal. Many there are who must needs yet learn this lesson.

TOPIC FOR JULY 22.

THE NEEDY AT OUR DOOR.

(Luke 16:19-31.)

Good literature must have the quality of universality. It must appeal to general experience. With this test our Lord's parables may be placed far forward on the list of the world's great literature. They appeal to us all as true. This Dives and Lazarus—do we not see them every day? Are they not in every eity—yes, and almost in every church?

Lazarus may have been a very foolish man The poor are usually foolish. They toll and spend their large earning in the busy season—glass-blowers, when the orders are full, builders in the summer months, and then, when winter or the slack days come, they starve. Like the five foolish virgins, they lack foresight, prevision. You may go into the veriest hovel in our city slums and, even though the cupboard may be empty, you will find, on the center table—with marble top—a red plush album and a piano lamp. Where food is not, these articles are. The foolish spendthrift poor!

When the evil days come, they appeal to us for aid, silently or with importunity, and we say: 'No; you had the same chance that I had, shall I now share my hard savings with your prodigality?' Listen, Friend Dives, great or small: Have we never paid too dearly for a trinket, you or 1? Have we never spent a feelish dollar, you and I? Who are we that we should not share? Who are we that we should not bear with the foolish spendthrift?

"We are fools and slight!

We mock thee when we do not fear.

O, help thy foolish ones to bear— Help thy vain worlds to bear thy light!"

This must be the confession of us all.

Send them, then, to the Charity Organization Society. Well, that is a good society. Scientific charity is quite worth while. It does great good; but after all, is there not danger of a pure mechanical and heartless ministration, an aloofness of cold investigation? No less of the scientific charity, but more of gentle, kindly help. Is it not possible that there are many needy at our door who sigh for the touch of a vanished hand of tenderness and the sound of a voice of compassion that is still? What the needy want as much as money—yes more—is friendship, sympathy, kindliness. In giving, let us give ourselves.

There is a preacher in one of the richest churches in one of our great cities who is constantly giving away what he has. He scarcely can live within his large salary. "He seldom," said his wife to me one day, "owns an overcoat. The ladies of the church are right now laughing about the necessity of taking up a subscription to buy him an overcoat." Well, such charity may be foolish; but it covers a multitude of sins. That man gives freely, unselfishly, his own heart. God, I believe, blesses such gifts. Such a soul as that will never lift up eyes out of torment and beg a drop of water for the tongue.

Book Notes.

Last Call! Our great offer of "On the Rock," handsomely printed and bound in cloth, for only Seventy-five Cents, positively expires July 23. We are compelled to make this time limit absolute. Until that date we will send this great book, postpaid, for seventy-five cents—just half the price at which it has always been sold—but on and after July 23 we cannot fill any orders. Remember, please, that July 23 is close at hand; it is just one week from next Monday. If you want a copy of the book, your only safe plan is to order it IMMEDIATELY, the very day you read this notice. Otherwise you may forget about it until it is too late.

You have an intimate friend who is a Pedobaptist. You have tried to convert this friend. Perhaps you have often argued the subject with him. But he is still unconvinced. The next thing for you to do is to present him or lend him a copy of 'On the Rock." Rest assured that if you can persuade him to commence reading the book he will finish it without any persuading, and that when he has finished it he will read it again, and when he has read it again he will probably know "the way of the Lord more perfectly." "On the Rock" is distinctly a great book, and for a few days we are making a great offer on it. We will send the cloth edition, which regularly sells for $150, for only 75 cents, provided your order reaches us before July 23. Remember that this date is close at hand, and that you must not delay if you wish to take advantage of this wonderful offer.

"Facts About China" is the title of a little work by Wm. Remfrey Hunt, of Chu Cheo, Central China, which every one should read at this time. What do you know of China? Precious little, if you are the average man or woman. Just now the eyes of the world are on the Orient. Great things will transpire there within the next few months or even weeks. We will send this valuable work, full of information about China and the Chinese, for only twenty-five cents.

A more extended work on China is "Forty Years in China," by Rev. Dr. Graves. It is a handsome volume of 316 pages, well bound and profusely illustrated. The price of this book has always been $1.50, but we have a few copies in stock which we will sell while they last, for $1.00, cash with order.

A great national election is upon us. Romanism can be depended upon to get in some of its dirty work during the campaign. There are yet a great many Americans who do not comprehend the height, breadth and thickness of the iniquity of Romanism. All such should read the "Debate of Roman Catholicism," held by Alexander Campbell and Archbishop Purcell in Cincinnati. It is a wonderfully enlightening book, which has had a revival during the past few months. Price (formerly $1.50) is now but $1.00, postpaid.

"Alexander Campbell's Theology," by Winfred Ernest Garrison, is a new and handsome volume, just issued by the Christian Publishing Company. The aim of the book is best expressed in the following extract from the prefatory note:

"It is of little consequence that a theologian is attacked by his enemies and defended by his friends. But it is of much importance that he be understood; and he cannot be understood—his strength cannot be appreciated, much less his shortcomings be reasonably condoned—without an acquaintance with the conditions under which he worked and the influences which worked upon him. It is hoped that this attempt to view Alexand:r Campbell's theology from the historical standpoint may contribute something to the understanding of it."

CHANGE OF ROUTE OF

ILLINOIS CENTRAL R. R.

The Illinois Central's Chicago-St. Louis line, over which the Daylight Special and the Diamond Special trains are run, has been changed between Clinton and East St. Louis, the new line now being from Clinton via Springfield and Litchfield instead of via Decatur and Pana as formerly. This is brught about by the recent acquisition by the Illinois Central Railroad Company of a portion of the St. Louis, Peoria & Northern Railway. It gives to the "Central" a first-class through line over its own tracks for the entire distance between Chicago and St. Louis, reduces the distance by six miles and brings Springfield, the thriving State Capital of Illinois, on to a through main line. From Chicago to Clinton the line continues to be via Gilman, Gibson and Farmer City. On this line the "Daylight Special" has been newly and elegantly equipped, and has had added to it two new features of radical interest, namely, a BUFFET-LIBRARY SMOKING CAR AND A COMPLETE DINING CAR.

The Buffet-Library-Smoking Car has comfortable lounging chairs, a convenient and well-stocked buffet, a well selected library of the currect books of the day and files of the leading monthly and weekly periodicals, and a desk supplied with stationery and other facilities for writing. The dining car has a capacity of thirty at a sitting and takes the place of the Compartment-Cafe, and the Pullman-Buffet features previously maintained on this train. It is open for meals (served a la carte) during the entire run between St. Louis and Chicago.

New Local Line Between St. Louis and Freeport

A through coach is now run between St. Louis and Freeport on local trains leaving St. Louis and leaving Freeport, in the morning. This is a first-class line for such points in Northern Illinois as Bloomington, El Paso. LatSalle, Mendora, Forreston and Freeport and, as good consection is made by this through car at Freeport with the Central's through Limited trains to and from the west, it is also a first-class line for Galena, Dubuque and local points west in Iowa. Connection is also made north bound with trains for Munroe, Dodgeville and Madison, Wisconsin.

Full particulars concerning the above can be had of any agent of the Illinois Central and connecting lines.

"Alexander Campbell's Theology" is a volume of 302 pages. It is one of the handsomest volumes ever issued by the Christian Publishing Company. Price, $1.00.

We are glad to announce a steadily increasing, volume of business in our book department despite the fact that at this season of the year there is generally a decrease. This means that our people are reading more books than they ever did before. We are kept exceedingly busy sending out first-class literature. Quite lately we have received a number of orders for "Alexander Campbell's Works"—the set of eight volumes and three pamphlets—comprising all the works of Campbell that are now in print, which we sell for $8.00. This special offer is deservedly popular, as at regular catalogue prices these books cost over $14.00.

"Christian Science Dissected" continues to have a splendid sale. This booklet, dealing with the fakes, follies, frauds and fallacies—if we may be pardoned the alliteration—of Mary Baker Eddy and her followers, is receiving high praise from the press and from prominent preachers and physicians. It is not a deep or abstruse volume, but a plain, practical and exceedingly lively discussion of the claims of Christian Science. The price is twenty-five cents.

MAGAZINES.

The Century Company announces the discovery of a new romantic novelist in a young New Yorker, Miss Bertha Runkle, whose maiden effort is to be The Century's leading piece of fiction for the next eight months, beginning in the August number. It is described as a dramatic romance of love and adventure, and is entitled "The Helmet of Navarre." The scene is Paris during the seige by Henry of Navarre, and the action occupies but four days of the week preceding the Sunday when Henry entered the city to give his adhesion to the Catholic Church and accept its ecclesiastical rites-the occasion of his saying that Paris was worth a mass. The story is full of vigorous action, and the plot is said to be one of fascina ting interest.

13 The Ledger Monthly for July has on its cover a tiny maiden asleep in a big armchair with one hand hanging down from which a toy picture book has dropped to the floor. "Tired Out" is the title of this pretty picture of home life, which every mother will want to frame and hang up. The contents of the July number of the Ledger Monthly are unusually varied and interesting. "Gloucester Fishermen and Their Fishing Craft." with photographic illustrations of scenes at the fishing banks and by the seaside and in the harbor, is especially attractive at this time of summer outings. "Views in Paris in 1900" afford all who stay at home magnificent views of the great Exposition and of the famous buildings and monuments of the French capital. "From Cannibals to Christians in Forty Years," by P. W. Thompson, gives a most interesting account of the remarkable Indian colony of Metlakahtla in Alaska, one of the most remarkable achievements in the work of civilizing and Christianizing the Indians in the history of America, and all the work of one man, brave William Duncan.

The July number of the Popular Science Monthly contains among other articles a paper by Simon Newcomb, the astronomer, entitled "Chapters on the Stars;" a new paper by Dr. Haffkine, the discoverer of the preventive against the plague on "Preventive Inoculation;" an article on the recent solar eclipse by Sears P. Langely of the Smithsonian Institution, and articles on New Sources of Roentgen Rays, on the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, "Malaria and the Malarial Parasite," by Dr. Patrick Manson, and on Washington as Explorer and Surveyor." Now published by McClure, Phillips & Co., New York.

The cotton manufacturing industry in the United States is treated of in two articles in the July Review of Reviews. Mrs. Leonora Beck Ellis tells of the rapid progress that the South has made in the establishment of "Cotton Mills in Cotton Fields." Miss Jane A. Stewart, on the other hand, explains the steps taken by New England cotton manufacturers to protect themselves against this new competition in the South. The Northern mills are now giving special attention to the making of higher grades of cloth, such as have formerly been imported from Europe, and textile schools have been opened for the training of expert workmen.

In the July number of the North American Review, the editor furnishes his readers with a well-nigh unprecedented collection of masterly articles, many of which bear the names of writers of world-wide fame. It becomes more and more evident each month that the Review is essential to the equipment of Americans who would understand adequately the trend of contemporaneous tendencies and events. Wu Ting-Fang, the Chinese Minister at Washington, shows in a brilliant article how there may be "Mutual Helpfulness between the United States and China." The story of "The Struggle for Reform in China" is told in a graphic way by Mr. Charles Johnston, a retired member of the Bengal Civil Service. Mr. Poultney Bigelow, who has twice visited the Flowery Kingdom, gives an admirable account of the conditions which surround Christian "Missions and Missionaries" in that distant land. General C. H. Grosvenor, who has so often been the spokesman of the administration, contributes "A Republican View of the Presidential Campaign," which is an aggressive reply to Mr. Bryan's pro nouncement in the June number of the Review. This number is filled with unusual y strong arti-

New Line to Buffalo.

The Wabash Railroad was the pioneer line in providing through eastern service for St. Louis. Our through line to Boston was the first and at that time the longest car line in the world, and has been in continuous daily operation since its ina guration.

Two years ago the growing interests of St. Louis seemed to warrant additional eastern service, and our Continental Limited to New York and Boston was placed in operation and has become an established success.

Though but two years have elapsed since the inauguration of our Continental Limited, we have just added another train to the east (via a new route) which appeals especially to business men. With a through sleeper for New York this train maintains the following fast schedule:

through solid.

Thee "Continental" is still the fastest train to Boston.

The evening train, 8:30, has three sleepers, one for Toledo, one for New York and one for Boston. Another improvement of interest to business men is the addition of an entire train each way between St. Louis and Chicago, leaving both cities at 11:30 p. m., with compartment and open section sleepers, arriving Chicago 8:00 a. m., and southbound at St. Louis 7:56 a. m.

Earlier trains leaving St. Louis for Chicago at 9:05 p. m. and Chicago for St. Louis at 9:15 p. m. will be continued in operation. They also have compartment and open section sleepers.

The day trains each way, parlor car, cafe and library car, etc., all high-grade equipment, completes the splendid service of three trains each way every day between St. Louis and Chicago.

The Wabash Railroad is a St. Louis institution, the only eastern railroad with headquarters in St. Louis, spending thousands of dollars in St. Louis annually and at all times endeavoring to promote the interests of St. Louis.

Offering splendid service and reminding you of our common interests, we solicit your patrorage. Our ticket office at Broadway and Olive is in charge of Mr. E. H. Coffin, who will be glad to point out our further advantages for travel in any direction from St. Louis but south. We have the shortest and quickest routes to Kansas City, to Omaha and to Des Moines.

He became a disciple of Jesus at the early age of 19 years and was a faithful follower of Jesus until his death. He married Miss Sarah E. Prigmore, Dec. 13, 1855. To this union were born eight children, six of whom are living in the church. He had been in poor health for several years, but no immediate danger was apprehended. I have known Bro. Berry 26 years and can say truthfully "he was a good man." While he had lived in this community from his boyhood none critized his character. ity from his boyhood none critized his character and devotion to his Lord. It was my privilege to and devotion to his Lord. It was my privilege to talk to the people on the occasion of his funeral. If one may judge of the qualities of a man by the spirit of the people who attended his funeral (and they were many), then David L. them five years ago. At the age of 17 she accepted Jesus as her Savior and has ever been his faithful disciple. She was a member of the Christian Church at Riggs, O., of the Union Aid Society and of the King's Daughters. Her sufferings were great at the last, but borne with true Christian fortitude and resignation. The community feel her loss, but rejoice in a hope of meeting her again. meeting her again.

LONGNECKER.

Mrs. L. J. Longnecker, who was born March 29, 1847, entered into the rest that remaineth for the people of God, June 26, 1900, at her home in this city. She was for many years a member on the Church of Christ and in all the affairs of life faithfully performed her duties. As a wife, she was constant and true; as a mother, full of love and elevation; as a neighbor and friend, agreeable and appreciative. Out from her soul had gone those streams of influence incident to the life that now is. Let us hope that on the bosom of these streams shall be borne up to the throne of God at the last day precious fruitage—new souls for the kingdom of precious fruitage—new souls God at the last day precious for the kingdom of peace and joy.

POWELL.

On May 8, 1898, that noble man of God, Bro. E L. Powell, passed from earth to heaven. On the 2nd of May, 1900, Sister Jennie E. Powell joined her husband in that happy land to abide with him ner nusband in that happy land to abide with him forever. Sister Powell was born in Harrodsburg, Kentucky. I knew her as a dignified senior at Daughters' College, Harrodsburg, and as a lowly "Prep." I worshiped her afar off. But I soon found that she was gentle and loving, and that I could nestle under her wing. Some time after her graduation she was married to Bro. E. L. Powell. After Mr. Carr and I returned from our six years' study in foreign lands we were located for thirteen years in Boone County, Missouri. During that time I had the happiness of renewing my association with Sister Powell. I found her to be even more beautiful than when I knew her as Miss Jennie Daniel, the gentle ideal of my girl-hood. As a wife she was faithful and true and sympathetic and helpful; as a mother she was kind and loving, bu ever firm and watchful and wise in discipline. She was a close student when young, and although she raised a large family that claimed much of her time and care, she continued to be a student throughout life. She infused her culture and refinement and piety into her children and such are cultivated even without the classic lore of the schools. Truly they can rise and call her blessed. Although a woman of fine literary taste she performed cheerfully and lovingly in the sweet spirit of service, the multitude of daily and laborious duties devolving upon the woman who is at the same time wife and mother and housekeep-As a church worker she was untiring and she was especially devoted to the C. W. B. M. She was indeed a rare combination. None knew her but to love her. Her sister, Mrs. Nannie Orr, of Benjamin, Texas, writes: "I shall sorely miss my dear sisters's loving, helpful letters." She was a noble Christian woman, as near perfection, I think, as humanity ever reaches, and I rejoice that the sweet memory of her friendship rests as a benediction upon my busy life.

RICE.

John D. Rice was born in Murrey County, Tenn., on Nov. 20, 1812, and died at Saratoga, Cal., May 31, 1900, after being confined to his bed three years. His father, Ebenezer Rice, was a native of Vermont and his mother, Catherine Baldridge Rice, was a native of North Carolina. His father removed early from Vermont to Tennessee as a missionary to the Indians. In 1833 J. D. Rice removed to Illinois and from there to Saratoga, Cal in 1882, where he resided until his death. He was the oldest of 12 children, four of his brothers being well-known preachers of the Christian Church. They were Elbert Rice, for many years pastor of the church at Jacksonville, Ill. and Allen, Virgil and Joe Rice, who were well known in Missouri. He leaves one brother, Wm Rice, of Saratoga, Cal., and two sons and three daughters. He became a Christian in early life and was identified with the Christian Church until his W. A. RICE. death.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The trunk line railroads have adopted a more humane rule for their conductors in case of passengers having neither tickets or money or refusing to pay their fares. They are to be ejected as usual, but with the least force necessary, with no harsh treatment nor abusive language, and only within station limits, and that not at unreasonable hours nor in such weather as would endanger life. This is far more humane than throwing a passenger from a moving train regardless of weather, place or results, as is sometimes reported to have been done. Under the new regulation the conductor is not allowed to eject a child, or a person of unsound mind, or a person who cannot take care of himself or herself. Verily the leaven of righteousness in the meal is working.

The trial of Alexander Jester for the murder of Gilbert Gates, in 1871, is now in progess at New London, Mo. This trial is being prosecuted by John W. Gates, who is now in Europe. The prisoner, Alexander Jester, is now an old man. The father of Gilbert Gates is still living and present at the trial as a witness. Mrs. Gates is also living, but will not appear as a witness, neither the sister of Alexander Jester, who is the one that gave out the information leading to the identity and rearrest of her brother for the crime. Both the prosecution and the defense have able counsel, and the trial is attracting wide attention. That so much incriminating testimony as prosecution is able to present after so many years is somewhat remarkable. And yet, the defense will insist that even the death of Gilbert Gates is not a known fact, much less that he was murdered by Alexander Jester. The result of the trial will be awaited with great interest by the legal fraternity and others.

The Transvaal war is not concluding so rapidly as England had expected. On the 13th General Roberts reported a reverse of considerable moment to his forces at Nitral's Nek, within eighteen miles of Pretoria. Two British guns and about two hundred prisoners were taken by the Boers. The casualties were heavy. There was also a strong resistance at other points. Lord Roberts' reports indicate that General Botha is making an attempt to recapture Pretoria. Lord Roberts has been sick, but is reported better. It is said that he will not be able to spare any more troops from South Africa for China. The situation is still serious in the Transvaal and the end of the war is not yet in sight. General Both evidently has not given up the fight, and it is thought that he is supported by a considerably large force.

Late news from Cape Nome, Alaska, is to the effect that the reports of gold findings have been greatly exaggerated, and as a result thousands of people have been lured to a barren shore in a helpless condition. Everything in the way of necessities of life are held at an exorbitant price, and the outlook for the people, many at least, is distressing. Gold has been found in spots along the shore and a few have succeeded, but the majority are prospecting in barren sand. Those who have made the largest profits out of the reports are the transportation companies. The indications now are that unless the government shall provide transportation back to the states, between the ravages of disease and the rigors of an arctic winter the population now at Cape Nome will be greatly reduced before another season opens up. There ought to be some prohibitory laws against such impositions upon the public by transportation companies. To lure people to a barren shore at exhorbitant costs and leave them there to perish with cold, and hunger and disease is a crime deserving of the severest punishment. It is the business of good government to protect the innocent against such frauds.

A dispatch from Admiral Remey, dated at Che Foo, July 16, confirms the defeat of the allied forces at Tien Tsin on the 13th in their attempt to relieve that city, in which 30 Americans, 100 Russians, 25 French and 58 Japanese were killed. Among the Americans killed are the names of Col. Liscum, and Capt. Davis, of the marines. But the returns were yet incomplete when the dispatch was sent.. It is becoming more and more apparent that nothing short of a vast army will be able to cope with the Chinese forces now in possession of Tien Tsin and Pekin, and the sooner this army can be mobilized the less difficult will be the task. Whether the Imperial Government in Pekin stands or has fallen is yet unknown. It is not improbable that a great deception has been palmed off upon the world. The Empress Dowager may have surrendered, or pretended to have surrendered, or to have been dethroned by Prince Tuan, to avoid responsibility for the lives of the foreign ministers.

The trial of persons accused of being accessory to the murder of William Goebel has begun at Georgetown, Ky., with the trial of Caleb Powers. After much delay a jury of the following political complexion was installed by the court: One Prohibitionist, two Independents, one Republican and eight Democrats. Of the Democrats some are said to be Brown and others Goebel Democrats. Of the professional or civil aspect of the jury eight are famers and four merchants. In the very nature of things such a trial as this will be attended with intense interest and partisan feelings, but it is to be hoped that no injustice or further destruction of life will result from the animosities engendered by the political strife through which Kentucky has so recently passed.

It is now reported that when Admiral Seymour found it necessary to retreat from his advance upon Pekin his wounded, whom they could not care for, were at their own request shot by their comrades in preference to being left in the hands of the Chinese to be tortured to death. It is known that persons taken by the Chinese have been subjected to the most cruel tortures imaginable. Even the bodies of the dead foreigners were fearfully mutilated. It is reported that the Russian Minister was cast into a caldron of boiling water before life had yet left his tortured body. And what is still worse, reports say that the foreigners in Pekin, seeing that they could no longer defend their wives and their children, first took their lives themselves and then fought the Chinese until they were killed. This seems like a moral impossibility, and yet the horrors of torture and shame to which they had been subjected or knew that they would suffer if taken by them may have made such a death preferable to them. Sure wrath is being stored up against somebody for that awful day of accounts.

The notification ceremonies of the Republican party took place at Canton, Ohio, on the 12th inst. Senator Lodge made the notification speech and President McKinley, standing on his front porch and addressing a large assembly of people, made his response. The passage in his speech which seems to have excited the greatest enthusiasm was his reference to the policy of the administration in regard to our new possessions. On this point he said:

"I cannot conclude without congratulating my countrymen upon the strong national sentiment which finds expression in every part of our common country and the increased respect with which the American name is greeted throughout the world. We have been moving in untried paths, but our steps have been guided by honor and duty. There will be no turning aside, no wavering, no retreat. No blow has been struck except for liberty and humanity, and none will be. We will perform without fear every national and international obligation. The Republican party was dedicated to freedom forty-four years ago. It has been the party of liberty and emancipation from that hour; not of profession, but of performance. It broke the shackles of 4,000,000 slaves and made them free, and to the party of Lincoln has come another supreme opportunity which it has bravely met in the liberation of 10,000,000 of the human family from the voke of imperialism. In its solution of great problems, in its performance of high duties, it has had the support of members of all parties in the past and confidently expects their co-operation in the future."

The notification of Governor Roosevelt of his nomination for the vice-presidency took place at Oyster Bay, his summer home. The speech was made by Senator Wolcott, and a brief response by the Governor. These occasions, together with the recent visit of Adlai Stevenson, vice-presidential nominee of the Democratic party, to Lincoln, and his enthusiastic reception by the people, with speeches by himself, Mr. Bryan and others, may be said to be fairly open the presidential campaign of 1900.

No authentic word has yet been given to the world from within the walls of Pekin, but rumors are of the most distressing and sickening character. If reports are true of the massacre of foreigners in Pekin the bloodiest chapter in human history since the days of Nero has been enacted within the gates of that city in this the closing year of the 19th century. Word comes from Shanghai that the foreigners in Pekin have suffered every kind of torture, and last of all a cruel death. But these reports are not authentic, coming only from Chinese sources, and these having been so conflicting in the past that in reality no one yet seems to know what has happened or been enacted in Pekin, but all fear the worst. The fighting at Tien-Tsin continues with terrible slanghter of Chinese lives and also of heavy loss to the allied forces, but no attempt has yet been made to estimate the full results of all the battles or of the almost continuous fighting at that city. Admiral Seymour has again been wounded and the allied forces have not been able to more than hold their ground. No attempt at the further relief of Pekin has been or can yet be made for some time for want of large reinforcements. Japan is throwing troops into China most rapidly and seems willing to undertake the subjugation of the Boxers, but the powers are yet not fully agreed as to how far Japan may be trusted in the matter. Japan is not in favor of the dismemberment of China, but agrees in the open door and will insist on a strong part in the settlement of the present lamentable insurrection.

The news from China during the past week has caused an alternation between hope and fear. Most of the news has come from Chinese sources and has proven to be thoroughly unreliable. Not a word has come from the ministers themselves to bring assurance to their countrymen that they are still living. At this writing it is believed that the worst fears concerning the safety of foreigners in Pekin is to be confirmed. The Chinese Minister at Washingto, who has all the while maintained an optimistic air, has been given a cipher dispatch from Secretary Hay to Minister Conger, of Pekin, as a test of the truthfulness of his theory concerning the safety of the ministers. Secretary Hay does not believe that he will get any response from his dispatch. Minister Wu Ting Fang professes to believe that he will. An alarming cablegram has been received from Consul-General Goodnow by the State Department to the effect that "the Boxers and soldiers were bombarding the legations for a final attack upon the 7ht of July." The Consul adds that fears of the worst are generally entertained. The concentration of allied forces still continues, as also does the bombardment of Tien-Tsin by the Chinese army, where a victory was reported against the allied forces a few days ago. Russia has withdrawn her objection to Japan's sending a large force to China, and she herself is said to be marching an army 30,000 strong on Pekin. It is certain that we are on the eve of important developments, and that in a little while we shall know the worst. It is reported that an international congress will be held at London as soon as the insurrection of the Boxers is put down, to decide on the future of China. It is believed that Great Britain, Germany, Japan and Italy will stand by the United States in its effort to maintain the integrity of the Chinese Empire. Minister Hay has made a strong representation to the powers of Europe that this is the desire of this government, and that our only purpose in sending troops to Chi a is to preserve life and restore

As we go to press the gravity of the situation in China deepens. The allied forces at Tein-Tsin have been defeated at great loss and may have to retire to Taku. The Chinese are armed with the most effective of modern implements of warfare and are under the control of strong military generals. The United States now has ten thousand soldiers in China and enroute for China, and word comes from Washington that twelve thousand more will be immediately ordered from the Philippines. The other nations are likewise making extensive military preparations, and all realize that the matter of reaching Pekin is going to be a momentous task. The fears of a general uprising throughout China against foreigners are now freely expressed, and reports say that England has decided on the arrest of Li Hung Chang should he attempt to go from Canton to Pekin via Shanghai and Taku on the ground that he is strongly suspicioned of being in sympathy with the Boxers and antiforeign movement. The dispatches from Washington indicate a strong probability of an extra session of Congress being called to consider the situation and to authorize the equipment of a larger army for the demands of the situation. The government still adheres to the position that we are not in a state of war with China, and will hold to this view, in common with other nations, until it is known that the government at Pekin was in some way implicated in the uprising against foreigners. But since the battle at Tein-Tsin on the 13th instant, in which the allied forces were repulsed, it seems that a state of war now exists, even if not officially or technically declared. At all events, the situation is exceedingly precarious, and something must be done and that right quickly.

Addressing the students of the University of Michigan and the citizens of Ann Arbor on "The Present Crisis in China," a few days since, President Angell gave the following intelligent statement of the causes underlying the present trouble in that country. The statement is of sufficient importance at the present time to justify a quotation of considerable length:

"The first cause lies in the great difference of the fundamental ideas and ideals of life held by the two peoples. The Asiatic reverses the past, the European looks for the golden age in the future; the European believes in improvement and invention, the Chinese cling to the same plow used 4,000 years ago; the difference in religious beliefs and thoughts is responsible for a vast chasm set between the two peoples, and finally every person of either side has a certain consciousness of superiority over the other. Even my house servants looked down on me with contempt while I was in China.

"Then there are special causes for which the Chinese view with dissatisfaction the coming of the foreigners. China never wished to admit them, but was forced to do so much against her will, and the sore still rankles. The foreigners have tried to introduce Western ideas-the telegraph, the railway and improved methods of mining. The Chinese think that these would desecrate the graves of their ancestors and bring from the earth and the air the most malign influences. The interesting coincidence here is that a great pestilence actually did follow the first railroad in the empire. The newspapers have exaggerated the effect of the work of the missionaries upon the uprising. The Chinese object to the missionaries primarily because they are foreigners, not because of fear for their religion. It is probably true, as the natives assert, that some converts go into the church in order to secure the immunities assured to them by treaty regulations. A more serious cause is the widespread rumor that the great powers are going to bring about an immediate partition of the empire. Finally, a reaction has set in against the reform measures suggested by the late emperor and his followers and the conservatives of all classes are up in arms to guard against change."

An ærolite or meteoric stone is said to have destroyed a large storehouse belonging to Hodge & Mabry, at Bellefontaine, Miss., on the night of July 11th. While the appearance of an ærolite in the heavens is not so infrequent, yet it rarely happens that one becomes destructive to property. This stone fell out of the heavens between nine and ten o'clock at night. It had the appearance of a ball of fire and exploded before striking the house.

"THE PARAMOUNT ISSUE."

One of the great political parties of the country has recently defined what it understands to be "the paramount issue" in politics at the present time. This issue is not oce which exists between the people of this country and foreign powers, but it is an issue between the political parties of this country. Whether "imperialism" a real issue or a false issue does not lie within the province of this article to decide. It is a good thing to have and to state a "paramount issue" in politics. The success of a party must depend upon its ability to distinguish those issues which are vital and fundamental to the welfare of the republic from those which are of minor importance, and upon the fidelity with which it deals with those issues. Time will tell which of the various parties whose platforms are now before the country have seized upon the issues that are really paramount in our national political life.

Christianity also has its "paramount issue." As between itself and all the unbelieving world that issue is whether Jesus of Nazareth, who was born at Bethlehem, brought up at Nazareth and crucified at Jerusalem, is the Messiah and the Son of the living God. If this be true, Christianity is the divinely given and the one universal religion of the world. If it be not true, then Christianity is false, being based on a falsehood. This is "the paramount issue" as between Christianity and the world. It was that which the earliest converts to Christianity were required to confess when the apostles and early disciples went everywhere preaching Christ. The supreme issue was: Is this Jesus of Nazareth the One of whom the prophets spake, and is He really and truly the Son of God, with the authority to speak for God; and is He in truth the Savior of the world? When men were convinced of the truth of this claim they confessed Christ, and through the initiatory ordinance of baptism enlisted as his disciples and sought to carry out his will.

Hence, the great question of the first century was: "What think ye of Christ; whose son is he?" This was the issue that divided men-divided believers from unbelievers; Christians from non-Christians. This truth was what united men-united all who believed on Christ and were willing to follow Him as their divine Leader. They had their differences of opinion, no doubt, about a number of questions which came up and which were more or less closely related to Christ, but their fellowship together was based on their common faith in a common Savior. It was the clearness and sharpness of this issue and the single-heartedness and whole heartedness with which it was urged in the first century that gave such marvelous success to Christianity. The apostles and first preachers of the gospel knew what "the paramount issue" was and they stuck to it even when it involved persecution and martyrdom. This is "the paramount issue" now-the supreme issue between Christianity and the world.

But professed Christians have some issues among themselves, just as the political parties have. What is "the paramount issue" between ourselves as religious reformers and other religious people? It is not in the inspiration or authority of the Scriptures, nor in the Lordship of Jesus, nor in the necessity of faith, of regeneration and of purity of heart and life. On these great questions evangelical Christians at least are agreed; but unfortunately, they have allowed themselves to be divided about a great many inferential doctrines and theories and about forms of church government and of public worship. We are agreed with all evangelical Christians in accepting the great fundamentals of Christian faith and doctrine. We differ from them in holding that what was "the paramount issue" in the apostolic age. between the church and the world is "the paramount issue" still, and that the church should have maintained its unity in Christ and under Christ in spite of differences of opinion and doctrine which do not invalidate Christian character: and that having lost such unity it should restore it by returning again to "the paramount issue." the foundation truth of Christianity, on which Christ said he would build his church. This involves, incidentally, the abandonment of human creeds as bonds of union or bases of fellowship, the surrender of party names and the return to the simplicity and the power of the original gospel and to the unity of the apostolic church. Is this return to Christ and to the unity for which He prayed practicable, and is it right? The people known as Christians simply, or as Disciples of Christ, hold that it is both practicable and right, and they make it "the paramount issue" of the age. On this issue the battle-lines were formed more than fourscore years ago, and the success which has attended the efforts of those who have sought to rally believers around the standard of Christ as the center of unity, the source of power and their only Leader is now the wonder and the problem of the religious world.

Let us see to it that we are not sidetracked on minor issues. Let us beware that we do not formulate unwritten creeds and traditions and make them tests of fellowship and barriers to progress. Let us keep "the paramount issue" before the world. Let it be known far and wide, among all nations and in all the languages of earth, that we are pleading for freedom from the tyranny of human creeds and for a return to Christ, in whom alone we can find both liberty and unity. This is what the people want. They are weary of denominational strife and of party shibboleths, of sectarian divisions, and long for that mutual fellowship, that liberty of thought, that unity of the Spirit which Christ gives to those who are committed to Him and to Him alone. As long as we keep this issue paramount, so long will we continue to prosper and grow, and the pleasure of the Lord will rest upon us. Departing from this supreme issue and permitting ourselves to be diverted from this great work to pursue party issues, we will find that our glory has departed and with it our success and our mission in the world.

hour of Prayer.

TAKE TIME TO BE HOLY.

(Psalm 11 9:9-11; Heb. 12:14-17.)

[Uniform Midweek Prayer-meeting Topic, July 25.]
CENTRAL TRUTH: Holinass of life, which is essential to our well-being here and here after, can be attained only through careful and thoughtful attention, and by a diligent use of all the means of grace.

Let us understand at once what it is to be holy. Holiness is wholeness, soundness, completeness. Sin spiritually maims, wounds, defiles, disables man. Christ's mission is to restore wholeness, moral health, spiritual robustness, the normal exercise of man's moral and spiritual nature and the proper use and control of the body.

Any one, therefore, who prefers health to sickness, strength to weakness, wholeness to imperfection, should aspire to holiness of life and of character. But merely to desire it is not to attain it. Holiness, or sanctification, is an attainment which requires time, self-denial, self-control, discipline, and a patient persistence in the cultivation of those dispositions and habits which go to make a whole and complete character. It is just here that so many fail. They would like to be as good as some others whom they know; they even aspire to be like Christ; but the cost at which so desirable an end must be gained is more than they are willing to pay.

In the psalm referred to above, some of the essential conditions of holiness are mentioned.

"Wherewithal shall a young man cleanse his way?"
The answer is:

"By taking heed thereto according to thy word."
"Taking heed" to one's way, considering it and comparing it with the Word of God is the first step toward improvement in life. Most people perish by traveling in the wrong way, because of heedlessness. They do not stop to think. They do not raise the question: "Is this way in which I am going according to the Word of God?" "Is it the way of holiness, that leadeth to everlasting life?" If men would only stop and ponder their way, especially the young, there would be far less moral tragedy in the lives of people about us.

The psalmist adds to the above answer:

"With my whole heart have I sought thee: O, let me not wander from thy commandments."

· Here is another essential condition of holiness:

"With my whole heart have I sought thee."

Whole-hearted seeking of the Lord and of the way of righteousness is the only way to attain unto holiness of character. The whole-hearted seeker after the Lord is not likely to wander far from His commandments. Then we are told how the psalmist pursued his search for purity of life:

"Thy word have I laid up in my heart, That I might not sin against thee."

This takes time for reading and meditation. It is not casual reading of the Word, but pondering thereon, which impresses it upon the heart and upon the memory. The Quiet Hour movement, in which so many young people are enlisted, is but a return to the method which this psalmist and which holy men of all ages have pursued—the setting apart a little corner of the day for the quiet study of the Word of God, with meditation and prayer. We do not see how it is possible for any one, young or old, to make any progress in the divine life without these moments of quiet solitude when the soul is brought face to face with God.

The passage from the Hetrew letter reminds us of how close the connection is between being at peace with God and with our fellowmen. The inspired writer exhorts us to "follow after peace with all men and the sanctification without which no man shall see the Lord." It is a bad sign when a man who claims to be religious cannot get on with his neighbors. It is a poor kind of religion that does not enable a man to live in peace with his fellowmen. Right relations with God is certain to bring us into right relations with our fellowmen. The passage, too, teaches, not only the duty of holiness or sanctification, but that it is absolutely essential to those who would see the Lord; who would have a true vision of Christ and enjoy fellowship with him. This is in perfect harmony with the saying of Jesus: "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." It is only in the atmosphere of holiness that the soul can have a vision of God and enjoy communion with Him.

This passage from Hebrews also enjoins the same duty of careful examination of ourselves and of our ways in order to avoid "falling short of the grace of God." It requires this watchfulness to avoid those sins of the flesh to which we are exposed. We are reminded of the example of Esau, "who for one mess of meat sold his own birthright." Esau is called a "profane person" because he exchanged his birthright, carrying with it spiritual privilege and blessing, for something to gratify his appetite. In other words, Esau fed his lower nature at the expense of his higher. Are there any of us who do that? Are there any persons in the prayer-meeting to-night who, in order to enjoy fleshly ease or to gratify an appetite or passion, whether of greed or lust, deny themselves spiritual privileges and blessings? Let each one of us examine his own heart and answer this question for him-

But whatever may have been true in the past, let us from this hour turn our faces more resolutely to seek after holiness of character, oneness with the Lord and right relations with all our fellowmen.

PRAYER.

O, Thou holy and righteous Father, who hast called us into fellowship with Thyself through Jesus Christ, Thy Son, we thank Thee for whatever desire Thou hast awakened in us after purity of heart and holiness of life. We thank Thee that through Christ, whom Thou hast sent to be our Deliverer, we may escape the corruption of this present world and become partakers of the divine nature, being transformed into the likeness of Him who is our Leader and our Pattern. Lead us, we beseech Thee, to forsake all our sins and seek to perfect ourselves in holiness of character, that we may enjoy Thy fellowship and Thy peace on earth and share Thy presence and glory in the world to come. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen!

Editor's Easy Chair Or MACATAWA MUSINGS.

Summer resorts, summer assemblies and summer schools are now the order of the day. They come from the feeling which is no doubt founded in right reason, that recreation or vacation need not and ought not to result in either mental or religious dissipation or inactivity; that the end of a summer outing can best be obtained when there is a little mixing up of intellectual and religious stimulus with our rest. We are in receipt of a little pamphlet containing the programme of the Maxinkuckee Assembly, located at Maxinkuckee Lake, Culver, Ind. This Assembly begins July 26th and continues until August 13th, and the bill of fare it offers is quite attractive. Among the popular speakers are ex-Gov. Cumback, Hon. Sam'l M. Jones-he of the "Golden Rule"-C. N. Howard, O. W. Stewart, President E. V. Zollars, J. P. Lichtenberger, Prof. J. W. McGarvey, J. B. Briney, A. J. Frank and others too numerous to mention. J. V. Coombs is president of the board of directors and also one of the lecturers. Beside the programme the pamphlet contains an eloquent description of the beauties of Maxinkuckee Lake and grounds. There ought to go out from such an Assembly, and no doubt will, many healthful streams of influence for the healing of society. A picture of the lake will be found on our first page this week.

Speaking of summer assemblies, we have our Macatawa Park Assembly, as usual, beginning with the first Snnday in August and reaching over the second. It is not a pretentious affair nor very elaborate. It is understood that the people come here mainly for rest and recreation, and the programme is arranged so as not to interfere seriously with that purpose. On each week-day of the Assembly there will be a Bible lecture at ten o'clock in the forenoon, followed by a "quiz," and in the evening of each day a popular lecture by well-known speakers. Prof. Lloyd, of California, who gave our Bible lectures once before, will be with us again this year. Those who heard him before will be glad of the privilege of hearing him again. The lectures will be by Rev. J. C. Cromer, of St. Louis; F. G. Tyrrell, Chicago, Ill.; Rev. C. L. Kloss, St. Louis, Mo.; Geo. H. Combs, Kansas City, Mo.; Prof. F. F. Frederick. One evening is to be devoted to a musical and literary entertainment. Our Assembly here is made up almost wholly of the people who are here for the summer, no special effort being made to induce a large attendance from the outside to attend these exercises. All who come, however, will be made welcome. The volume entitled "The Teachings of the Books," by Rev. J. M. Campbell and Prof. H. L. Willett, is made up of lectures previously delivered in this Assembly, and is one of the most helpful books we have read. Each book of the New Testament is taken up in turn, and is subject first to an historical treatment by Prof. Willett and this is followed by its spiritual teaching, by Dr. Campbell. We know of no volume issued in modern times that is likely to prove more helpful to one wishing to get a comprehensive knowledge of the New Testament. It is published by the Fleming Revell Company and can be secured also from the Christian Publishing Company.

The poet is right. There are "thoughts that lie too deep for utterance." Human speech is at best an inadequate contrivance for expressing thought. It is a wonderful instrument, indispensable to human progress, but every one is conscious, at times, of feelings, of thoughts, that refuse to be embodied in any words at his command. In moments of meditation, when alone, looking out, it may be, on a vast stretch of blue waters, bounded only by the dim and distant horizon, or gazing with rapture upon some radiant sunset, when the evening sky and clouds are painted with a glory all divine; or, as last night, watching the full moon rise over the trees and shed her soft radiance over the placid lake, one's soul must be partially dead, at least, not to recognize the all-pervading Presence and to feel the magic touch of that invisible but ever-guiding Hand which is seeking to lift us out of the bondage of the material and bring us into fellowship with the spiritual. But can we adequately express these thoughts and emotions? Poetry can come nearest doing it, but there are few poets. Art is an effective mode of expression, but there are few artists. Painting and sculpture are but efforts of gifted souls to express thoughts which lie too deep for utterance in speech. Music is another mode of expressing feelings which can find utterance in no other way. What, after all, are art, music, oratory, architecture, literature, but efforts of the human soul to express itself? But what poet feels that he has sung his sweetest song? What artist has ever put on canvas his highest ideal? Evermore we feel that there is more in us than has ever found expression.

Is not this desire of the soul to express itself in forms of beauty and utility a manifestation of the divine image in which it was created? Through all the aeons of recorded time God has been seeking to disclose himself to men. The material creation is but a sublime theophany-a manifestation of God's wisdom and power and goodness. "The heavens declare the glory of God and the firmament showeth his handiwork." He has been expressing his great purposes in the ongoings of human history. He has spoken to men through human speech, for "holy men of old spake as they were moved by the Holy Spirit." By types and symbols, by dreams and by allegories, by history and by prophecy, God sought to express Himself so that men would understand His character and His will. But God had a thought too deep for utterance in human speech, and so "the Word became flesh and dwelt among us." "God manifest in the flesh" gave for the first time an adequate expression of His character and of what He would have men be. All human progress consists in coming to a better knowledge of God and in progressive assimilation to His character. He who would shut God out of human life only so far as He may be able to express Himself in human language, has never come to any just conception of the many avenues by which God is seeking to enter into our lives and remodel them and transform them into His own image. As the all-surrounding air seeks to enter into our houses through every crack and crevice, amd by every open window and door, so does the all-encompassing influence of the divine presence seek admission into our souls through the ear, the eye and touch, through reason, through conscience, through imagination, through all the powers and susceptibilities of our complex being. Let us see to it that we keep both the highways and the byways of access to the soul open for all pure and divine influences, which come as angel visitants to woo us onward and upward to higher and holier lives. So shall God best express Himself in our lives and characters, and through us convey a saving message to our fellow-

Some of the later arrivals at the Park, known to our readers, are T. P. Haley and wife, who are quartered at the Macatawa Hotel; Geo. H. Combs, also of Kansas City, who joins his family here, and Mrs. J. J. Haley and her daughter Helen, and their son Sidney, whose health is very poor. W. Palmer Clarkson, of St. Louis, has also joined his wife here. It has been a week of clatter and turmoil at Edgewoodon-the-Lake, for we have been in the hands of carpenters and painters. A summer cottage is never finished. But quiet has now been restored, and we hope to be able to rest and work undisturbed. Macatawa Park is flourishing, and we never saw it look fresher and fairer than it does now.

Questions and Hnswers.

- 1. In an editorial note, replying to Bro.Old-ham, you said: "The truth or the Word of truth is a much broader phrase than the writ-Word." Will you please explain that statement, and show us the how and the where of this broadness? Or, do we know anything of the truth, or the Word of truth, outside of the uritten Word? For answer I prefer plain statements instead of speculative philosophy.
- 2. Again, do you endorse A. B. Jones' position on real and formal forgiveness? Do you think he represents or misrepresents the p sition of Alexander Campbell?

D. W. Pritchett.

1. It ought not to require much reflection to convince any one that truth is broader, higher, deepeg than any verbal expression of it. There are truths to be communicated which cannot be put into words. This was one of the principal reasons that made the incarnation necessary. God could not fully manifest himself in words, and so he became "manifest in the flesh;" that is, in a human personality. "In him was life, and the life was the light of men." Many a skeptic and unbeliever has been won to faith and obedience by the pure, unselfish, consecrated life of another. Jesus recognized this fact when he said: "Let your light so shine before men that others seeing your good works may be constrained to glorify your Father which is in heaven.' Character is one of the mightiest forces for righteousness in the world, and character is only truth embodied and exemplified in a life. The old saying that "example is better than precept" is only another way of saying truth is better conveyed by life than by verbal expression. The two methods, of course, should supplement each other, but it would be a fatal mistake to deny to truth any method of expressing itself except in words. This we know was the Lockian philosophy, but the world has gotten beyond that philosophy. Every recognition of the value of personal influence is also a recognition of the fact that truth, which is only another name for reality, is broader than words.

2. We believe that the point that Bro. Jones is aiming at, by the distinction which he makes between "real and formal forgiveness," is a true one, though we would not like to commit ourselves to every argument or statement he has made. We think the source of much confusion on this point arises from the different meanings which we attach to the phrase "remission of sins," which is the phrase used by Bro. Jones. Remission of sins, in New Testament usage, must include at least two things: First, the putting away of the sins themselves-the cessation of sinning; and second, the taking away of the guilt of sin. The latter without the former would avail nothing. With the putting away of actual sins is involved, of course, the putting away of the love of sinning. This twofold sense of remission of sins is recognized in the couplet of the old hymn, "Rock of Ages:"

"Be of sin the double cure, Cleanse me from its guilt and power."

Also in the lines of another familiar hymn:

"Take away the love of sinning, Take my load of guilt away."

This is the twofold sense in which we must have remission of sins to enjoy peace with God, here and hereafter. Now our queriest and all of us are agreed in believing that remission of sins, in the sense of the putting away or cessation of sinful acts, together with the love of sinning, is an inward moral or spiritual process, accomplished by faith and repentance, prior to baptism. In view of this changed moral condition, God offers to take away the guilt of those sins which are no more practiced in our lives, and baptism is the means by which he pledges to us this blotting out of the guilt of the past. This is the distinction, as we understand it, which Bro. Jones is making by the use of terms "real" and "formal" remission of sins. The formal part is for our benefit, in helping us to a knowledge of forgiveness, and in declaring to the world our changed purpose and life. It is an adaption of divine wisdom. to human need and should be looked upon always as a provision of God's grace and not as our denominational friends seem to regard it, a work of law. Those religionists who believe in baptismal regeneration would, of course, make no distinction between the actual sinning and the removal of the guilt of sinning. Both of these are accomplished in the act of baptism, according to their theory. But we are not baptismal regenerationists. We hold that there is nothing in baptism to change the moral nature of man, but that this change is effected by the power of God through faith and penitence. We must never lose sight of this ditinction, whatever terms we may use to make it apparent. Alexander Campbell always made it, though by using the terms "regeneration" and "conversion" in different senses in different portions of his writings he has sometimes laid himself open to the charge of baptismal regeneration, which is wholly false. He certainly did make the distinction between "real and formal remission of sins" at one period in his life, though it is easy to quote passages from his writings which would ignore it. We do not idoubt, however, that Mr. Campbell always, in his own mind, made a clear distinction between the moral change, resulting in the putting away of sin from the heart and life, and the formal act of the remission of sin's guilt in the act of baptism.

- 1. Where did Luther say, "I pray you leave my name alone and do not call yourselves Lutherans, but Christians; who is Luther?" etc?
- 2. Where did H. W. Beecher make a statement credited to him in which he says: "On earth for convenience sake we are called Presbyterians, Congregationalists, etc. Let us speak the language of heaven and call you simply Christian?" Mr. Lee quotes this in "Why I Left the M. E. Church."

C. C. Redgrave.

1 & 2. We cannot verify these quotations, or give the works from which they are taken. Perhaps some of our readers can do so.

Is it scriptural to celebrate the Lord's Supper by returning thanks for the loaf, then immediately for the cup, then pass both tothe church, the cup closely following the loaf?

A Disciple.

We cannot say that the practice is either scriptural or unscriptural, because there are no specifications in the Scriptures as to the exact method of administering the Lord's The general custom of offering thanks for each emblem separately, distributing the loaf before thanks are offered for the cup, seems to be in more close conformity to the record as we find it in the New Testament, if we feel ourselves bound by the exact order there observed. But in such case, we should also recline at the Lord's table, after the ancient method, instead of sitting erect on our seats as we do. More attention should be given to the spirit in which the institution is observed, we think, than to the distinction between the different methods observed.

THE RECENT GROWTH OF AMERICAN COLLEGES.

B. A. HINSDALE.

A year or two ago one of a small company of young men of business in which I happened to be for the time turned suddenly to me with the question: "How is it in education, Mr. Hinsdale? Is it the same as in business—everything tending to run into a few great establishments?" While I was familiar with the fact that the large schools as a class were outstripping the small ones, still this sharp putting of the question caused me, when opportunity offered, to institue a closer examination into the matter.

In one feature there is evidently no parallelism between college education and business. Colleges and universities are not being compounded or agglomerated into large institutions; they are not pooling resources and work, or forming educational trusts. So much is certain. Nor does it seem likely that the pooling movement or trust movement, so prominent a feature of business, will appear in the educational world. It is true enough that Hon. L. D. Harvey, superintendent of Public Instruction of Wisconsin, contended before the National Council of Education a year ago that we need a university trust, but what he meant by the name was an "organization of graduate work in the state universities supported largely by taxation." He argued that many of these institutions aim now to carry on many lines of graduate work which result in duplication of equipment, instruction and experimentation, and that if an understanding could be reached among the institutions interested or a trust be formed whereby this duplication could be arrested it would save large resources of men and money for undergraduate purposes that are now greatly needed and at the same time greatly strengthen graduate work itself. While something can be said in favor of this scheme, there is probably little likelihood of it being carried out. Moreover, if it was carried out to the letter it would not give us a college trust save in a very limited sense of the word.

But this is a merely formal difference after all. Colleges and universities may not be merging themselves in trusts, and may not be likely to do so, and yet there may be a decided tendency for college and university students to flow together in a comparatively small number of great schools.

The number of students in attendance upon colleges compared with the whole population has fluctuated considerably at different times. The well-known inquiry into the subject made by President Barnard, of Columbia College, in 1870, showed that the ratio in New England alone at four different periods were as follows: 1826, 1 to 1,513; 1838, 1 to 1,294; 1855, 1 to 1,686; 1869, 1 to 1,927. Here was a gain from the first date to the second one. And after that a steady loss. Within the limits given the population of New England had increased in that time more than 50 per cent. President Barnard claimed that a similar declension had taken place throughout the country after 1838, and his discussion of the statistics of New York sustained the claim so far as that state was concerned. He found the explanation of the loss of interest in the general adherence of the colleges to the old, rigid course of study. He held that the traditionary type of college education had ceased to satisfy the needs of American society, and that the colleges were losing their hold in consequence; and he found confirmation of his theory in the growth of institutions that gave modern studies the largest encouragement and that carried the principle of election of studies farthest. For illustration he pointed to Harvard and Cornell Universities and to the University of Michigan. Dr. Barnard's statistics have never been challenged, but have rather been universally accepted; and no doubt the weight of opinion to-day, however it may have been in 1870, would incline to his explanation. But, fortunately, Dr. Barnard wrote on the eve of a better day. Attendance upon the schools of a higher grade was about to enter upon an increase. Thus the Commissioner of Education printed in his report of 1897-'98 a table showing that the number of students in such schools to a million of the population of the whole country increased from 1872 to 1898 as follows: Undergraduate, collegiate and technical students, from 573 to 1.193; graduate students, from 5 to 74; law students, from 49 to 163; medical students, from 142 to 328; theological students, from 83 to 147. The total gain was, from 853 to 1,875 to a million, or fully 125 per cent.

In respect to the main point, these statistics tell their own story without note or comment. They show an extraordinary growth in the attendance upon colleges and universities. They also suggest these important questions: "Have the various kinds of institutions grown together in equal measure?" "Have some one class of institutions grown more rapidly than the others?" "And if so, what class?" These questions, which are but forms of one question, can all be answered together. In the comparison which follow the statistics embrace only college students proper.

In 1880 the three of Connecticut reported students as follows: Trinity College 101; Wesleyan University, 173; Yale College, 687, making a total of 951. In 1898 the corresponding numbers for the three institutions were, 134, 315 and 1,724, or a total of 2,171. At the first date the ratio of Yale students to all others was, 687 to 264; at the second date the same ratio was, 1,334 to 449. Or, once more, while Trinity and Wesleyan together gained but 70 per cent, Yale gained 125 per cent.

The Massachusetts institutions that reported in 1880 and 1898 will be put in a tabular view:

| Anherst College | 389 | 369 |
|---------------------|----------|--------|
| Boston College | 186 | 180 |
| Boston University | 107 | 417 |
| College of the Holy | Cross 91 | 20 |
| Harvard College | 886 | .2,240 |
| Tufts College | 63 | 274 |
| Williams College . | 227 | 359 |
| Total | | |

In 1880 the Harvard students were to all others as, 886 to 1,013. In 1898 they were to all others as, 2,240 to 1,804. Or, at the one period, they were 44 per cent, of the total number, while at the other period they were 55 per cent. While the growth of Harvard was extraordinary, 157 per cent. still the result in Massachusetts is less striking than in Connecticut, owing in great part to the growth of Boston University and Tufts College. No explanation of the growth of these two institutions is at hand further than the important fact that Boston University is a coeducational institution.

Brown University had 247 students in 1880, and 759 in 1898. The gain was a little more than 200 per cent. Dartmouth College counted 247 and 571 students at the two periods; Bowdoin College, 149 and 243; Bates College, 138 and 261; Colby University, 149 and 231.

In the old Middle States similar results are obtained. Going to the West, we are confronted by the extraordinary number of small schools teaching in the aggregate a large number of students; still the general fact is the same as at the East. In Ohio the University of Cincinnati counted 104 students in 1880; 286 in 1898. The corresponding figures for Ohio State University were 124 and 970; Ohio Wesleyan University, 270 and 629; Western Reserve College (Adelbert College at the later period), 66 and 332; Oberlin College, 324 and 424; Dennison University, 65 and 221; University of Wooster, 181 and 247; Kenyon College, 66 and 89.

Indiana University grew from 183 to 944; two of its leading competitors, Wabash College and Asbury University, from 96 to 124 and 212 to 429 respectively.

In 1880 the University of Michigan counted in the department of the arts 521 students and in 1898, 1,534. The corresponding figures for all the colleges in the state, the university included, were 1,131 and 2,464. Three new institutions with 107 students were established in the course of the period. The three leading competitors of the University taken together barely held their own, gaining only nine students.

College attendance in Wiconsin increased from 748 to 2,135, but the State University increased from 340 to 1,329. The total gain was less than twofold, while the University gain was more than threefold.

College attendance in Illinois, and throughout the Middle West also, has been profoundly affected by the establishment of the University of Chicago. Still, the tendency is the same here as in other states. Northwestern University increased from 183 students to 551; Knox College from 105 to 331; Lake Forest University from 75 to 96; Illinois University from 259 to 696.

It is unnecessary to extend these inquiries farther. The main point is perfectly clear, namely, that the strong and especially the great schools in the period under consideration made an extraordinary growth, both absolute and relative. No doubt the later statistics were made up with more care than the earlier ones, but this in no way affects the result. Besides, if we had the statistics of the last two years the conclusion to which all the figures point would be materially strengthened.

Moreover, this growth is quite irrespective of the character of the school as regards origin and control. The great schools have grown phenomenally, no matter whether they are the old colleges of the East or the new State Universities of the West.

The significance of these facts can hardly be mistaken. It is that the small and particularly the weak schools are unable to compete with the large and strong ones. With the growth of the strong schools the elevation of the college standard, the greater ease and quickness of transportation, as well cheapness, and the consequent extension of travel, and the increase of wealth, which enables a constantly increasing number of students to incur expenses that but a short time ago were wholly beyond their reachthese forces, together with the enhanced valuation that is now placed on the best education, especially as a preparation for certain careers, as for example teaching, are working in the interest of the wellequipped colleges and the universities with prodigious power. Students are all the time looking more and more to the standing prestige of the college that they attend, or think of attending. Even the strong preferences of parents, such as grow out of denominational feeling and prejudice, are in many cases overborn. What a well-informed writer said a year ago of the denominational colleges of the West may be said of a majority of them throughout the country: "They are falling behind. The better one knows them, the more this fact is borne in upon one. The struggle for existence becomes harder with each year."

Such is the showing at the close of each year. What the future will bring forth is mainly a matter of speculation. It seems certain, however, that a considerable number of colleges can never recover the ground that they have lost, either absolutely or relatively, but must continue to decline, until they will take their place among secondary schools, or, in some cases, even cease to exist. It is not impossible, or perhaps improbable, that there will be a revulsion of opinion and practice which will check the centralizing tendencies of the times, and so check the growth of the great schools; but it seems quite clear that such schools will play a part in the future to which we have not been accustomed in the past. Still, there is little reason either to hope or to fear that they will come to hold a place in the educational world comparable with the place that the great business corporations hold in the business and industrial world. There is much reason to think that the advantages attending centralization are sooner reached in an educational institution than in a business establishment. Schools of second rank, and even of third rank, will continue to be useful, possessing as they do advantages peculiar to themselves, separate and apart from those that grow out of accessibility to considerable numbers of students; and the more useful they will be if their number is only limited by natural selection and the wise self-restraint of founders and contributors, so that they may be able to bear up strongly in the intense competition to which they will be subjected.

OUR COLLEGES—IV. The Solution of a Vital Question.

N. J. AYLSWORTH.

Ninety years ago a young man landed on these shores, looked about him and then spoke. Had God touched him? I know not, but his voice was strangely prophetic. His word was "Christian Union"-a strange, unwelcome sound in those days. With wonderful eloquence of tongue and pen he pressed this duty on an unwilling church. With clearest insight he discovered what hindered its accomplishment, and pointed out its necessary basis and conditions. Most of his utterances are now household words in the churches of Protestant Christendom and Christian union is the recognized goal of the church. Has he done all this? Probably not; but he saw it all in the early dawn, when it was yet dark, and he has wrought most mightily to its accomplishment. wisdom rose well-nigh to inspiration. He was so great that he cried in the sublimity of unselfishness: "You must not call me master: one is your Master, even Christ," and not an institution among us bears his name. A great infidel came to this country and with high-sounding words challenged the leaders of i's Christian hosts to meet him. It was this man, and he alone, who went forth, sling in hand, to meet this Goliath, and he slew him utterly in the presence of all the people.

But this master-mind wrestled with another question-that of education. He saw with clear, prophetic eye the defects in college training; and after much travail of soul he brought forth the college of the Bible. As his plea for Christian union is yet the newest and wisest word spoken on that subject, so his idea of college education is the new, wise thought which the Christian world needs most to lay to heart in this perilous hour. Alexander Campbell is not outgrown. The Christian world has not yet overtaken him, and his thought will be still young after another fifty years. He has solved for the world its mightiest problem in Christian statesmanship, that of the basis of Christian union; he has solved for Chrisendom its greatest problem in education. His word is the one wisest, completest thing spoken on that subject in all this century.

We call the college the student's alma mater (fostering mother). Ah, there is the thought—motherhood! Never in all his life has the boy who kisses his mother farewell to go to college needed a mother more than then. But the mother who rocked his cradle cannot help him now. Other hungers, other dangers are to be his. There is to be another birth, and where a birth is there should be motherhood. The incoming of that new, mighty, masterful force, the intellect, must not sweep away the Paradise of the childhood faith and leave the heart a desert. The cable of the hanging garden must be inwrought with strong thongs of reason before that beautiful world fall to earth a ruin. The youth must be carried safely from childhood's to manhood's faith. The college must be a home—a bower of the heart—as well as a training school of the intellect. Unless religion be a fable the college that ignores this violates a law of the human mind. If Christianity be true every college for youth must have the Bible in its course or be a pitfall and a snare.

Our colleges are modeled on this plan, introducing religion into the body of their instruction, grounding the pupil in Christian evidences and giving him some general knowledge of the Bible; and the wisdom of this course has been abundantly vindicated. They are doing their work most happily. The youth who goes to them is safe. Is he a Christian? His faith is deepened and firmly established on its manly basis. Is he unconverted when he goes from you? He will almost surely return to you a Christian. Hundreds go to these colleges out of families that are not religious and become Christians, and perhaps even preachers or consecrated missionaries. These colleges are veritable alma maters, cherishing mothers, where motherhood of the soul is found in this great, orphaned world. They are sheltering homes and the best and most inspiring nurseries of spiritual manhood. And vet. President Zollars estimates that they are receiving but a small proportion of the patronage of our people. The pledging of our plea for Christian union was a master stroke of spiritual genius: the inauguration of the Christian college was another such stroke. The one is everywhere recognized among us; the other is largely ignored. Why this difference? The answer is that one has been preached constantly, while the other has been left to shift for itself. It is time that our pastors began to teach the people on this subject. He is not the true pastor who conducts the services of the church, visits the sick and buries the dead. Weighty questions, which are destined to try us as a people are at our very door. In their answer lies our destiny. Here the pastor must speak with no uncertain sound. tions do not fall from dangers which they see, but from those they little suspect. fall of a great nation is the surprise of a Belshazzar feast. It is so, too, that movements go out and great peoples are lost. The question of the support of our colleges is at our door. If we blink it it will be ours in another generation to say: "I am "I am Christian fathers, there is no place in all this land where your son or daughter will be so safe for Christ and for nobility of life as in our colleges; and if you do not send them there our colleges are lost; and if our colleges are lost, we are lost.

A cry has gone up from our educational institutions—a pleading; strenuous cry. It means danger. It means that a new hour has struck in our history. We have brave men at the head of these institutions. They are of the stuff that heroes are made of. They will not wince at toil or hardship. They do not want ease or luxury. But they stand where they see how the battle is going; and if their cry is not heard it will be ours, like Esau, to weep bitterly when it is too late.

THE SPIRITUAL SIDE OF OUR PLEA.

Alexander Campbell on Remission of Sins.

A. B. JONES.

The debate between Alexander Campbell and N. L. Rice was held in Lexington, Ky., in the autumn of 1843. Mr. Campbell was then fifty-five years old. He had been a conspicuous figure in religious society as preacher, writer and reformer for twentyfive or thirty years. His views on all important points of Christian doctrine were, it is to be presumed, thoroughly established. The discussion was entered into with great caution and deliberation on both sides. One whole year was consumed in arranging propositions and preliminaries for the de-The correspondence that brought about the debate was all published with the This correspondence serves to throw much light on the attitude of the disputants toward the topics discussed. There were six propositions considered in the debate. We are at present to deal with but one of these, and that is the following: "Christian baptism is for the remission of past sins." The question is now and here raised in as emphatic a form as we can make it-What did Mr. Campbell mean when he affirmed that proposition? Did he mean. in the broad, unlimited, unqualified sense, as a certain school of thinkers in our own ranks now teach, that baptism is for both the real and formal remission of sins? Did he mean that there is no remission of sins, in any sense, before baptism; or did he mean that baptism is the outward, formal, legal act of obedience that completes the process of our transition from the world, and our induction into the kingdom of Christ? Did he mean anything different from his declaration on this subject in his debate with Mr. McCalla, twenty years before, in which he held that "Paul's sins were really pardoned when he believed—formally pardoned when he was baptized?"

In direct and unequivocal answer to all these questions it is here affirmed that Mr. Campbell's position on this subject in 1843 was precisely the same that it was in 1823. We now undertake to make good this assertion. Let it be understood, however, that while Mr. C. always held to the idea that baptism is for the "formal" remission of sins, he held and taught that this was a very important point in Christian doctrine and practice. A capital point he made before the world in his plea for reformation was that the "ordinances" of Christianity were neglected; that they had been relegated to an unimportance wholly incompatible with the sacred Scriptures. In the preliminary correspondence to his debate with Mr. Rice Mr. Campbell says, page 17: "Allow me, then, to say that the three great topics which have occupied public attention for some twenty-five years, so far as our purposed reformation is concerned, are:

"1. The ordinances of Christianity.

"2: The essential elements of the gospel

"3. The influence of human creeds as sources of alienation, schism and partyism in the church."

The correspondence prior to this debate shows that Mr. Campbell was anxious to make an issue with Mr. Rice on the weekly observance of the Lord's Supper, but failed to do so, the Presbyterians conceding that the weekly observance was legitimate and not unscriptural.

But let us direct our attention now to the single point of Mr. Campbell's attitude on the design of baptism in this debate.

The simple fact that Mr. C. affirmed that "Christian baptism is for the remission of past sins" proves nothing on the special point of the present investigation, for the reason that whenever it was proved by the Scriptures that baptism was for either real or formal remission, the proposition was sustained. Mr. Campbell did not choose at that time to make the distinction. It was not important for him to do so. He affirmed that baptism was for the remission of sins; and he proved it clearly by scriptural arguments that have never been answered. In the meanwhile, his opponent proved just as clearly from the Scriptures that sins are remitted without and independent of baptism. Mr. Campbell complained that Mr. Rice did not follow him and answer his arguments. Mr. Rice could not do it Nor could Mr. Campbell answer Mr. Rice's arguments. His failure here is as patent as Mr. Rice's failure. When Mr. Campbell quoted the Scripture, "be baptized for the remission of sins," Mr. Rice could not answer; and when Mr. Rice quoted the Scripture, "he that believeth is not condemned," Mr. C. could make no reply. And all this for the simple reason that one passage refers to formal remission, and the other to real remission.

Did Mr. Campbell have any mental reservations on this subject in his discussion of this question? Did he understand that there was a real pardon on the ground of faith in Christ, and yet that there was a formal remission in law, that was of vital importance; and that it was to make this appear that he affirmed that "baptism is for the remission of sins?" We assert that he did; and trust to the debate for the proof of the facts. The preliminary correspondence shows that they had much difficulty in formulating the propositions to the satisfaction of both parties. It looked several times during the year's correspondence that the debate would fail because of their inability to agree on the exact wording of the propositions. The first proposition which Mr. Campbell submitted on the design of baptism was as follows: "You affirm that there is no indispensable connection between baptism and the remission of sins, in any case; we affirm that there is."

Notice the careful, cautious wording of the proposition-"We affirm that there is an indispensable connection between baptism and the remission of sins"-simply a "connection." This verbiage indicates a mental reservation, beyond doubt. And then, on page 15, he submits another proposition on the same subject, still more thoughtfully and cautiously worded: "There is a scriptural connection of some sort between baptism and the remission of sins of a believing penitent"-"scriptural connection of some sort." This guarded, limited way of speaking of the design of baptism is characteristic of Mr. Campbell's writings; but not characteristic of the writings of some other men, who have very inadequate and super ficial views of Mr. C.'s teachings on this su b ject, and of scriptural teaching as well.

In this correspondence prior to the debate Mr. Campbell distinctly states that he stands ready to defend what he teaches and practices. "I will defend what I teach and practice, in plain and definite propositions," is his language.

The eyes of our understanding will be still further opened on this subject by the third proposition he offers on the design of baptism, which is as follows:
"Personal assurance of the remission of past sins, to a believing penitent, is the chief design of baptism; or, if you prefer it, baptism is for the remission of sins.

It is impossible to mistake the meaning of Mr. C. here. When he says "baptism, is for the remission of sins" he means, "the chief design of baptism is personal assurance of the remission of past sins." If I buy a piece of property by positive contract and stipulations it is mine in equity, and the deed, which is executed to me afterwards, is the formal "assurance" in law of my ownership. So Mr. Campbell held that baptism is the "assurance" in law of that "real pardon" granted to every "believing penitent" -baptism is the deed to his remission of sins.
And that Mr. Campbell was clear in his own mind, and bold and confident in taking this position, is made most manifest in the following paragraph of this correspondence,

"Christian baptism is designed to confer personal assurance of the remission of sins on every legitimate subject; or, Christian baptism is for the remission of past sins. This is my doctrine on the subject, and this I will defend. You may use all that I have written upon the subject, if you please; but such is the concentrated view which I propose."

Here Mr. C. not only makes it clear that he holds to the doctrine of "baptism for remission" in a sense only, in a limited way, but he opens wide the door of investigation into all his writings, for his opponents to prove the contrary. And yet, we have preachers by the score in our own ranks who stand side by side with our religious opponents and quote the same passages from Mr. Campbell's writings to prove that he held to "baptism for the remission of sins" in an unlimited sense, Mr. C.'s protests to the contrary notwithstanding!

Additional light may yet be thrown on Mr. Campbell's idea of the design of baptism by still another form in which he presents his proposition in this correspondence, page 39: "That to a proper subject, baptism is for induction into the Christian covenant, or for the remission of sins." It will be seen that all along Mr. C. wanted an explanatory clause connected with the statement, "baptism for the remission of sins."
Why did he want this? Because he held to "baptism for the remission of sins" only in a qualified way. As he expressed it in 1835, in his allusions to Mr. Meredith: "It was in his allusions to Mr. Meredith: always alleged by us that 'in a given sense, and under certain limitations, and for certain ends, remission has been connected with bap-We never went further than this: tism." our opponents said we did, but no man can show from our own language that we have ever transcended the words above quoted from Mr. Meredith."

We are now prepared to consider this subject in the light of Mr. Campbell's utterances during his debate with Mr. Rice.

Our Budget.

- -Are you campaigning for Christ?
- -Do you know the greatest issue of the day?
- -Is Christ your Leader, or are you looking for another?
- -Is the platform upon which you stand from heaven, or from men?
- —It is the duty of every man to pray, vote and work for the kingdom of God.
- —We had an excess of more than twelve columns of matter in type, of which our columns would not admit last week.
- -We have made some headway on our leftover copy this week, but we are still far behind. Many excellent articles still waiting for the light.
- —Watch the columns of this paper for state and national convention news from this time forward. The brethren in Kansas City, are at work, and no needed work on their part will be lacking in the production of a great convention.
- —O. J. Smith, in "The Coming Democracy," has discovered a new 16 to 1. He says: "We are sixteen millions of voters. One million, perhaps, are interested through spoils or privileges or the expectancy of such favors in bad government. The other fifteen millions are interested in good government." That is to say that of the 16 million voters in the U. S. one million vote in the objective case and 15 millions in the subjective case, their opinions to the contrary notwithstanding; otherwise we would have "good government."
- —Neither pains nor expense seems to have been spared in the preparation of the 49th annual catalogue of Christian College, Columbia, Mo. From the printer's standpoint it is about as handsome as the art can produce. From the college standpoint it is as complete as the most exacting seeker after knowledge could desire. The halftone cuts of the buildings, rooms, students, etc., etc., are fine. The history and prospectus of the college are highly satisfactory. Send for a copy. Mrs. W. T. Moore and Mrs. L. W. St. Clair, coprincipals.
- —The 20th Century Quarterly, Washington, D. C., abounds with the utterances of the Ecumenical Conferences, recently held in New York City, on the awful results of the liquor and opium traffic in the Foreign Mission fields and of the condemning evidence of the army canteen and the growth of saloons in Manila since it fell into the hands of the American army. There are facts enough cited in this one issue of the Quarterly to put the nation and the entire church to shame. Send to Rev. W. F. Cratts, Washington, for a copy of this magazine.
- .—Parties writing to the church in Winterset, Ia., are requested to address the "Church of Christ," in order to avoid confusion.
- —Bro. W. H. Waggoner conducted a missionary institute at Grant City, Mo., last week. It was well attended and highly appreciated by all, and without doubt will be of great value to the church in the way of increased offerings for the different missionary enterprises. All the churches need Bro. Waggoner's work. The program of the Nodaway Valley district, which is to be conducted at Grant City Aug. 28-30, is full of good things, and the best convention in the history of that district is expected. All who intend attending the convention are requested to send their names and addresses by Aug. 15th to W. H. Harris, Grant City, Mo.
- —The annual camp meeting of the Christian Church in Arkansas will convene at Mineral Spings on Friday evening before the first Lord's day in August. One of the principal speakers of the meeting will be T. F. Wener.

- —The Weekly Visitor, Hutchinson, Kansas, gives an encouraging state of affairs in the Church of Christ in that city. D. Y. Donaldson is the pastor.
- —The Christian Messenger, Portsmouth, 0, is full of announcements for the various activities of the Church of Christ in that city. Geo. P. Taubman is the pastor.
- —The Bible Student, Lockney, Texas, in addition to local church news finds considerable space for leading articles on its pages. It is edited by G. H. P. Showalter.
- -Evangelists Jamison and Helm, the former of Sioux City, Ia., and the latter of Dallas, Texas, recently held a successful meeting in Alton, Ia. The Alton Democrat speaks in the highest praise of Elder Jamison's sermons and Evangelist Helm's singing.
- —It will be to your interest to turn to the advertisement of the "Student's Miisionary Campaign Library" in this paper and learn of the opportunity to supply yourself with the best missionary literature of the day at a most reasonable cost.
- —In another place we print a beautiful and loving tribute to Alexander Procter, by his friend and brother, George S. Bryant, of Independence. The article was written for the Kansas City Times and is copied from that paper. We reprint it because we are sure that our readers will appreciate it, and because it is better to scatter some of our flowers along the pathway of the living than to leave them all for the coffiin and the grave. Bro. Procter still lives, though in great feebleness. May his last days on earth be made bright and peaceful by the presence of the Master, whom he has so long and faithfully served.
- —The Searchlight, published at Worcester, Mass., says that Dr. B. B. Tyler's letters, appearin the Christian-Evangelist, are alone "worth the price of the paper per year to New England readers." While our Eastern brethren hold these letters in such high esteem they are not their only admirers. Dr. Tyler is a capital letterwriter and he is admired as such wherever the Christian-Evangelist circulates.
- —According to the published report of the financial affairs of the Church of Christ in Dayton, O., the total collections of the church for church purposes amounted to $3,894.93; and for building purposes, $4,814.56.
- —A conference of the League of American Mothers will be held in Chicago, August 1-3, to which all mothers and the thousands of league members from all over the country are invited. For full information concerning the summer conference, entertainment and railroad rates, send a stamped envelope with inquiry to Mrs. Andrea Hofer Proudfoot, national organizer of the League of American Mothers, 9333 Prospect Ave., Chicago, Ill.
- —We desire to call the reader's attention to the advertisement of a new tract or booklet in this paper entitled "Public and Private Rights." This tract or booklet of 64 pages was written by the assistant editor of this paper and will put you in possession of some of the newest proposed economic reforms of the day. It is suggestive, helpful and hopeful. Whether you concur in all of its conclusions or not you will not regret its reading. The advertisement will give you some idea of the contents of the book.
- —The Northfield Summer Conferences and Bible lectures are to be held as usual this summer. The season opened June 29th and will be continued until Sept 1st. Every effort will be made to make the season as profitable as in the days of the noted person who founded, managed and inspired these conferences and Bible studies.

- —H. O. Breeden, pastor Central Church of Christ, Des Moines, Ia., says: "It was recently my pl asure to examine the manuscript of the forthcoming text-book on 'The Book of Revelation,' by Jasper S. Hughes. It is a clear, strong, stirring work. In it is condensed the ripe fruit of many years of study and research. It is keenly discriminating and incisive and peculiarly felicitous in its interpretation of the mooted passages of that mysterious book. The author is vigorous in his style and especially strong in his presentation of the literary setting of the revelation. In my opinion the book will be popular and appreciated by the students of the 'Books of the Bible."
- —It is doubtful if any one ever read a more interesting series of articles on education and our colleges than the one now appearing in our columns, written by Brother N. J. Aylsworth. They are fine thoughts clothed in elegant language.
- —There is no local church paper that comes to us more regularly and shows greater persistency to live than the Redwood Christian, edited by J. D. Robinson, Eureka, Cal.
- —The Lighthouse, published at McKeesport, Pa., for July contains an interesting account of the church in Steubenville, O., established originally by Alexander Campbell in 1830. The present pastor of the church is J. W. Kern, who enjoys the distinction of preaching to one of the largest audiences that assembles in Steubenville.
- —The next Congress of the Disciples of Christ will be held at Lexington, Ky., the last week in March, 1901. The committee in charge of the program is F. D. Power, chairman; Hiram Van Kirk, secretary; S. M. Cooper, R. C. Hieronymous, H. O. Breeden. If any one has a topic for discussion, a name for the program or any other suggestion, address Hiram Van Kirk, the University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill.
- -The last article by Bro. Oldham prove i to be, not an additional article concerning the Holy Spirit, as we had supposed and announced, but a stricture on some recent articles by another contributor on Mr. Campbell's position on the distinction between the "real and formal remission of sins." That question is best determined by a thorough examination of Mr. Campbell's published works, and if this discussion should accomplish nothing more than to excite renewed interest in his writings, leading to a more general reading of them, it would prove a source of mental and spiritual enrichment to many. We do not care to discuss this question, however, and drop it now with this statement: Whatever use the terms "real and formal" in connection with the remission of sins may serve in clearing up any misapprehension that may exist in the minds of some, when we have arrived at a clear understanding of the subject they can be dispensed with as they ordinarily are in the discussion of this subject, and as they are dispensed with in the New Testament. The existence of extreme views on any question is certain to give rise to a new set of terms to define and to defeat such view. When they have accomplished their purpose they pass out of use. The tendency of some writers among us to an overemphasis of baptism has given rise to this effort to distinguish between the moral change which consists in a new disposition and new affections, and the marking of that change by the overt act of obedience in baptism. This does not affect the correctness of our historic position as to the relation of baptism to remission of sins. It is simply a change of emphasis, not so much from the original statements of the fathers as from subsequent statements. Concerning Mr. Campbell's position in relation to the Holy Spirit we shall have something to say soon.

—According to Dun's Commercial Review there were 5,362 failures with liabilities of $100,570,134 for the first six months of the year 1900. This is considerably in excess of the failures for a like period since the panic. We wonder how many domestic failures and spiritual shipwrecks have occurred since Jan. 1st, 1900?

—The annual catalogue of the Carr-Burdette College and Conservator of Music, Sherman, Texas, for 1899-1900 and for 1900-1901 presents the claims of an institution of learning and an equipment that one who has daughters to educate where the climate is an essential factor cannot afford to ignore. The success of this college has commanded wide attention and the equipment of the building and efficiency of the faculty will continue to make it an attraction to parents who have daughters to educate, and especially those whose health requires the influence of the milder southern climate.

—The following sad message from Dr. R. B. Turner, Canton, Mo., is dated July 11, 1900:

DEAR BRO. GARRISON:—Bro. B. H. Smith passed quietly away at 6 A.M. His death was peaceful and quiet, like the brave, courageous Christian. He had made all arrangements, even to the selection of the Scripture to be read at his funeral, which by his request will be conducted by Bro. J. H. Hardin. Suitable obituary will follow.

Bro. Smith belonged to a class of preachers of whom but few remain, but to whom the churches of Christ owe much. They were strong men in the restoration of primitive Christianity movement and the establishment of Christian colleges, and their names will not be soon forgotten.

—J. H. Hardin, pastor of the church in Liberty, Mo., sends us the following message in relation to the departure of Bro. B. H. Smith, of Canon. Mo.:

B. H. Smith, of Canton, Mo., the mighty preacher and eminent educator, is dead. He died July 11, after five years of inactivity and suffering, caused by paralysis. He was buried at Canton, July 13. The writer preached in fulfillment of a promise exacted by Bro. Smith several years ago. E. J. Lampton, Louisiana, Mo.; L. H. Stine, Quincy, Ill., and Pres. Cook, of Lagrange, Mo., participated in the services. A competent person will prepare an extended sketch of his life for our papers.

"Fallen on Zion's battlefield, A soldier of renown."

-The following bit of news from Bruce Brown, Denver, Col., will be found interesting:

Last Sunday farewell services were held in the Central Church building. It will be torn down to give place to a skyscraper. W. B. Craig, who was pastor when the building was erected, spoke in the morning and B. O. Aylesworth in the evening. Both delivered magnificent addresses to as many people as could be crowded into the house. After buying our new location, the finest in the city, we have $24,800 left as a nucleus of a building fund. The South Broadway unanimously voted to invite the Central to meet with it until the new building is completed and the pastor the Central to be the pastor of both churches until that time. The matter will be voted on by the Central July 22nd.

—The American School for Study and Exploration in Palestine is to open in October, 1900, under the direction of Prof. C. C. Torrey, the recently appointed Professor of Semitics at Yale University. It will be located at Jerusalem, and will be of great help to special students of Biblical Antiquities, and will, no doubt, lead to new and important discoveries in even that muchstudied land. According to the plan of the Archæological Institute it will be supported by contributions from twenty or more of our leading colleges, and students from any of these institutions will be admitted on certificate. Other applicants will have to show a working knowledge of Latin, Greek and Hebrew, as well as French and German. Its managing committee consists of Drs. Wm. Hayes Ward and John P. Peters, of New York; Prof. H. G. Mitchell, of Boston Universi y, and Prof. Theo. F. Wright and I. Henry Thayer, of Cambridge.—Treasury of Religious Thought.

Numerous papers are arguing that the administration has done a beneficent work in nullifying the anticanteen law on the ground that the beer-selling canteen keeps soldiers from whiskey-selling "dives" outside. No proof is given that at any specific place outside saloon has been displaced—in fact they have increased—but the sufficient and crushing answer is that where most of our soldiers have been through all this anticanteen controversy, in Manila, Cuba and Porto Rico, the President and War Department have had full control of saloons on the outside as well as inside.

—According to the Lewiston Journal, Maine, the Free Baptists and Methodists of East Franklin propose to unite on the following basis:

1. It is asked that the Methodists concede every offer Snnday to the Free Baptists.

2. That the Free Baptists dissolve their church organizations.

3. That the Methodists dissolve their Sunday-school.

4. That the Free Baptists dissolve their Sunday school day-school.

5. That the Methodists cease all denominational work

6. That the Free Baptists cease all denominational work.

7. That one society, that shall be known as the Undenominational Christian Endeavor, shall be organized.

8. That one Sunday-school shall be organized, to be known as the Undenominational Christian Endeavor Sunday-school.

9. That the time shall be equally divided bytween the Free Bantist and Methodist preachers.

tween the Free Baptist and Methodist preachers.

10. That all money collected from the Sunday-school shall be used to advance Sunday-school

11. That all money collected from the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor shall be used to advance Christian Endeavor work.

12. That the ministers' salaries shall be paid by subscription and collections, each paying what and to whom he prefers.

13. That in the near future a Christian Endeavor chapel be built with the funds now on hand and what may be collected hereafter for that purpose, to be owned and controlled for all time by sald society.

14. That the peace of God and the fellowship of his Spirit be with this effort.

The fraternal spirit manifested in these articles of agreement are commendable, but for a basis of unity a much shorter and simpler platform could have been found.

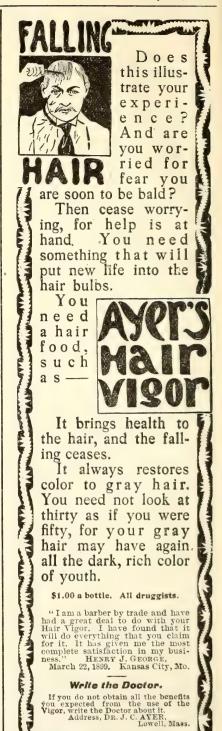

—The Inter-Ocean's New York correspondent gives the following account of "a new church founded in Brookly:"

A new church, with a creed of its own and composed of persons of various denominations, has been organized in Brooklyn. Its formation is the result of services held during the last two months under the leadership of the Rev. James S. Brockinton. The Brooklyn presbytery some time ago appointed Mr. Brockinton to look up the possibilities of establishing a Presbyterian Church in Leffert Park. Several meetings were held by the presbytery to form the church, but as a quorum could not be secured no definite steps could be taken. Mr. Brockinton, however, continued preaching, and finally the people decided to form a church of their own. The organization will be known as the Union Church, and Mr. Brockinton has been chosen as pastor. The creed of the church as given out is: "God our Father; Christ Jesus the Savior of all who truly believe in him; the Holy Spirit, author of regeneration and sanctification advocate; the Bible, God's Word, authentic record, our guide; unity. Go teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost. There shall be one fold and one shepherd. A cordial welcome to all God's neonle of every tribe and nation."

God's people of every tribe and nation."

Members of the presbytery are said to be surprised at the organization of the church with a creed of its own, and the Presbyterian Union for Church Extension has appointed a committee to see if the church cannot be made Presbyterian.

It is strange that they were so soon tempted to become the very thing they sought to avoid in their organization, viz., sectarianism.

—The American Bible Society has received from its agent, in Japan, the Rev. Henry Loomis, his annual report, in which he states that the first effects of the completion of treaty revision and the abolition of extra territorial jurisdiction have been helpful to Bible work. In every important city in Japan, where any Christian work is being carried on, Scriptnres are on sale in the most prominent places.

On last Sunday the assistant editor preached in the Fourth Christian Church of this city in the absence of the pastor, E. T. McFarland, who with his wife is visiting his parents at Columbus, Ia.

-The Ladie' Aid Society of the Church of Christ in Hermon, Ill., has aided the church in the repair of its house of worship. S. A. Ennefer is the pastor.

-The church at Troy, Mo., has called Bro. Assiter to its pastorate and further correspondence with that church for the pulpit is unnecessary. Bro. Assiter has just returned from England and may feel complimented on finding himself in demand so soon after his return.

-The West Virginia Christian, published by the West Virginia Christian Publishing Co., is a commendable journal, edited by J. A. Canby, J. W. Yoho and A. R. Bryan. In type, paper, make-up and matter it compares most favorably with some of our older state journals.

- he Messenger, Lexington, Ky., announces the return of J. W. McGarvey, Jr., from a tour of Egypt, the Holy Land, Turkey, Greece and other parts of Europe. His trip covered about 20,000

-The summer days always bring a certain quietude among the churches of this city, and what is true of St. Louis is true of other cities. Many of the leading members of the various churches leave for a vacation or a rest, and this breaks into the arrangements of churches to a great extent, often necessitating a reorganization of activities for the summer months. Some churches close up entirely for the hot season, others for the Sunday evening service only, but the majority of the churches keep at work throughout the season. The attendance at all the services, as a matter of course, drops down and the interest runs less swift, but there are no closed doors for the season, no cessation of hostilities against that wicked one. In the fall, with cooler weather, all the churches are always in line for a new and greater campaign of righteousness for the Master.

Daniel Trundle, who who was at Florence, Col., has accepted a call to preach again at Elma, Wash. He was at Elma six years ago. He regrets leaving Florence, but a successor has been secured and the church will not suffer a pastorless interim.

W. R. Seytone, having resigned the pastorate of the Church of Christ in East Palestine, Ohio, a very tender farewell reception was tendered him, in which not only the members of his flock, but other ministers of the city and members of their flocks, were present and participated in the ex-ercises. The Ministerial Alliance of East Palestine also gave public testimony to their appreciation of Bro. Seytone's ability and life as a minister of the gospel.

SOME SWEDISH SCENES.

Before leaving Denmark there are one or two other matters which call for remark in addition to the language, the pretty girls and the museums. One is the architecture, particularly in the matter of towers. The Danes seem to have a special predilection for curious towers. No classic or conventional model restrains them. The problem with every tower-builder is apparently to devise something radically different from every other existing tower. In consequence a large Danish city like Copenhagen, when seen at a bird's eye view, presents a diversified and characteristic appearance. There is the glittering copper dome of the Marble Church. There is the massive round tower of Trinity Church, like the "keep" of a Norman castle. The black and-gilt tower of Vor Frelser's Kirke has a special stairway wrapped around it on the outside, and at each upward turn the diameter of the tower diminishes be the width of the stair. Most curious of all is the tower of the Exchange, which is topped off with four dragons whose entwined tails, held aloft, form a spire. In addition to these may be mentioned twinneedle spires of the Cathedral of Roskilde, which will recall to every traveler the similar pair of spires at Lucerne. The windmills of Denmark, which are almost as numerous as those of Holland. are always roofed with a domelike cap of the shape of a pineapple cheese.

I cannot consider that I have done my duty by Denmark until a good word has been said for her children. Nothing goes further toward determining the flavor of a visitor's impression of a place, be it a single home or a whole kingdom, than the demeanor of the children; and in Denmark one cannot take this factor into consideration without raising his estimate of the whole country. In the first place, one sees more signs of home life in Copenhagen than in any other city in Europe, so far as I have gone, and that is unquestionably the reason why the children behave so charmingly. I will give one illustration where many might be given. One evening I was looking for the residence of a man whose exact address I did not have. Thinking I was near the place, I inquired of a gentleman who was playing with his children, six or eight of them, in his front yard. He did not know exactly, but gave me some general directions and detailed one of his boys, a little chap of about ten, to act as guide. Together we hunted for perhaps half an hour, but without success, though the youngster was diligent in ringing doorbells and making inquiries, always with his cap in his hand. When at last we gave it up and were parting, I emphasized my thanks by offering him, as delicately as possible, a coin worth about a dime, which he with courtly grace declined. He lifted his cap, I lifted my hat, and we parted; and I felt very much as if I had been tendering a sixpence to the Prince of Wales.

It is possible that the reader does not appreciate how near together Denmark and Sweden lie. I am sure I did not until I saw them both in the same glance. A beautiful road runs along the Danish shore of the Oresund for twenty-five miles from Copenhagen to Helsingor, with the Swedish coast in full sight across the narrow sound all the way. At Helsingor one visits the castle of Kronberg, the guns of which used to command the narrow strait through which all the traffic of the Baltic passed. Until forty years ago Denmark levied toil on every ship which went through. More interesting but less historical is the connection of this castle with the story of Hamlet, for here is the "platform before the castle of Elsinore," where Shakspere makes the ghost of Hamlet's father appear, and on a hill at a little distance is a column which is supposed to mark the tomb of Hamlet. It might also be remarked that there is a "Hamlet Bicycle" which is extensively advertised in Copenhagen. The castle, the column and the wheel make about equally plausible claims to authentic connection with the melancholy Dane.

The passage by ferry from Helsingor in Denmark to Helsingborg in Sweden is about equal to the crossing of New York Harbor from Twentythird Street to Jersey City. But here one steps into a different country and is saluted by the officials in a new language, which they must know in advance that you will not understand. Harrowing reports had come to me, on very good authority, about the strictness of the Swedish customs officers in regard to the admission of bicycleshow one had to deposit the amount of the duty and how there was very little chance of getting it back, even if the wheel were taken out of the country again a few days later. Instead of this the gentlemanly official merely required me to sign my name to something in Swedish, presumably an egreement not to sell the bicycle in Sweden. I signed and have kept the promise-if I made one.

My route in Sweden gave me a ride of about three hundred miles in the western part of that country, following the coast in a general way, but sometimes dropping back twenty or thirty miles into the interior. The first hundred miles of that journey lay through a fairly well cultivated and apparently prosperous section, though even here there was more sand than is conducive to the best results in either agriculture or cycling. Farther north the country becomes broken and hilly. Scrubby woods take the place of fields, and towns become infrequent and insignificant. masses of granite and gneiss, lying in irregular ridges and knolls, lend a certain desolate picturesqueness to the scenery, which is otherwise devoid of attractiveness. Along the coast there are productive fisheries, but what the inhabitants farther inland do to earn a living is more than I can imagine. Certainly, they do not live on the tourists, for that section of Sweden is not much frequented except at a few favored spots, and the hotel rates are astonishingly cheap. When one pays the equivalent of seventy-five cents for supper, bed and breakfast at a really good hotel it would almost seem that the tourists were a burden on the community rather than a means of

About the middle of this route through southwestern Sweden lies the city of Gotenburg, the most important place in the country after Stockholm, and known especially by reason of the "Gotenburg system" for regulating the liquor traffic. The system is similar to that which is in force in Norway, and has the same features of governmental control and governmental absorption of all profits above a certain small per cent, but in its actual workings it is here considered to be somewhat more effective than the Norwegian system.

Gotenburg has the general appearance of a Dutch city, with its numerous canals and high-gabled houses, as well it may, for it was planned and built by Dutch traders. It looks very much as Rotterdam would if the latter were modernized somewhat and washed.

The ride along the Gotha River, north from Gotenburg, presents some of the best scenery in southern Sweden. Granite hills, partially wooded, rise on both sides of the valley. I know of few more picturesque scenes in any land than that which one sees from the grand old castle of Bohus, which crowns the summit of a lofty island at the point where the river divides to enter the sea through its two mouths.

Forty miles more along the same river, with charming scenery and a wretched road—sometimes merely a casual rock-strewn track in the sand and always hilly—brings one to the famous Falls of Trollhattan, universally acknowledged to be the finest cataract in Sweden and ranked among the half-dozen finest in Europe. The many mills which utilize the water-power destroy the picturesqueness of the total effect, and instead of a cloud of mist and spray one sees a cloud of factory smoke. Besides, it is difficult to get a view of the whole, for the river loses itself among a dozen islands and the falls, by which the river drops something over a hundred feet in all, are scattered along for nearly a mile.

But, though less impressive as a whole than one has a right to expect, the many small falls which make up Trollhattan are as swift and strong and beautiful as one could desire, when viewed in detail at close range. One charm about the place is that you are constantly discovering new bits after you thought you had seen it all. I spent more than a day there and am not sure now that I saw all of the falls.

There was one spot, just in front of my hotel window, which particularly delighted me. The river, having gotten clear of the islands, is crushed together between rocky walls and makes its final plunge through a gorge so narrow that one could easily toss a pebble across. Distances across water are sometimes deceptive, but I am sure that a pebble can be tossed across here, for I nearly dislocated my arm trying, and at last succeeded.

The reader whose strong point is geography will perhaps remember that the Gotha River is a part of the great waterway which, under the name of the Gotha Cana, connects the eastern and western coasts of Sweden, the Baltic Sea with the Cattegat. The locks by which steamers are lifted around the falls of Trollhattan are, in their way, perhaps, unsurpassed in the world. By eleven locks in succession steamers ascend a stairway over a hundred feet in height. The locks are really more interesting and more of a wonder than the falls. A waterfall may be very beautiful, but it never appeals to me as being wonderful. Cliffs are common enough, and when one occurs in the bed of a river there is nothing for the river to do but to fall over it. But to see a large steamer go upstairs to get above that same waterfallthat may or may not be a beautiful sight, but it is much more marvelous.

That part of Sweden which lies between Trollhattan and the Norwegian boundary has not yet emerged from the primitive condition in which the earth was a desolation and a waste. Sand, granite, heather and a few stunted pines are the chief elements of the scenery. Loose sand and irregular stones are the sole ingredients of the road, which is absurdly hilly considering the fact that there are no really large hills to be surmounted. The most interesting feature in this somewhat dreary situation is the people, whose constant courtesy is a delight. The Swede lacks much of the natural companionableness, the facility for easy acquaintance, the Gemuthlichkeit, which characterizes the German, but he has a sturdy reliability and straightforward honesty combined with a respectful politeness which I have seldom seen surpassed. The Frenchman has the reputation of being the polite man of Europe, and so he is in a way. No one can be so exquisitely polite to his friends and guests as a Frenchman, and no one can be so rude to strangers. The Swede knows how to be polite to strangers. My appearance as a cyclist must have been very surprising in some of the remoter districts, but I do not remember that I was even stared at in an objectionable way in Sweden.

Nearing the Norwegian boundary the scenery improves, the trees have more size and dignity and the roads are letter. Suddenly the road comes abruptly to the shore of a beautiful fjord -I had almost called it a lock, so like was it to those narrow arms of the sea which indent the western coast of Scotland. In particular it reminded me of Ballachulish, where I had ferried across one evening at this same twilight hour, and here, too, I must be rowed across. My strongarmed oarsman took me over in a quarter of an hour. At the end I offered him half a krone. He looked puzzled and declined it, demanding as his modest guerdon a coin worth a cent and a half. Then I knew that I was not in Scotland, for the canny Scot at Ballachulish had charged me a shilling because I was a wheelman.

Just beyond the fjord was the boundary stone and a little Norwegian customs house. I knocked and rang, but no one came; evidently it was not the custom officer's day at home. So I entered W. E. GARRISON. Norway unannounced.

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

This letter is written in Plymouth, Mass. Here the Pilgrims landed in 1620. Their voyage across the Atlantic occupied more than nine weeks. Plymouth is an interesting place with a population of possibly ten thousand souls. Its quietness is sometimes almost oppressive. For me it is an ideal resting-place. From my window I look out on the placid waters of the bay in which the Mayflower cast anchor. Even the Atlantic is pacific at this point. Tourists contribute to the support of the resident population of Plymouth. It is said that about 25,000 travelers came to the place during the season. There is some manufacturing here, as in every town and city in New England. The largest cordage works in the world are in Plymouth. Almost every place possesses something which can only be described by the use of a word in the superlative. There are woolen mills and cotton in the old town. Shoes are manufactured and iron is worked. There is labor enough, with good wages, to keep the people in comfort. The people of Plymouth are well dressed, well fed, w-ll behaved. Some one told me that there are, on the average, about sixty or sixty-five persons in the county jail. This seems to be a large number, but it is probable that in Plymouth County persons are confined in the jail who often, in other places, are permitted to enjoy liberty. Law is enforced i. this part of the world with unusual

Pilgrim Hall is the center of interest for visitors. It was erected by the Pilgrim Society in 1824 as a monument to the Pilgrim Fathers. It was rebuilt in 1880 and made fireproof by Mr. Stickney, of Baltimore, born in Boston. The place is full of Pilgrim and other mementoes. Here, for instance, is a clock once owned by John Hancock, still marking time, and an ancient sofa which belonged to the same old rebel, on which probably he and Samuel Adams more than once sat while they plotted treason against the hated English Government. It is said that there are not more than four copies of John Eliot's Indian Bible in existence, one of which is in Pilgrim Hall. Probably not a man on earth can read this Bible. Those for whose benefit it was made have perished and their language is no more. Here is a portrais of Edward Winslow, the only one in existence, so far as known, of any person who came to America in the Mayflower. Daniel Webster's On a day's or a summer's outing home was not far from Plymouth. His portrait, life size, adorns Pilgrim Hall. Ralph Waldo Emerson was married in Plymouth. The house in which the nuptials were celebrated is pointed out. One house remains in the town which sheltered one of the Mayflower Pilgrims. Peregrine White deferred his birth until after the completion of the historic ship that he might have the honor of being the first pilgrim born in America! Bright boy was Peregrine! His cradle is in Pilgrim Hall. This prococious lad was so well pleased with the new world that he remained in it eighty-eight years. There are interesting relics of the redoubtable Captain Myles Standish. The Captain was small in stature, but he was a good fighter. He held a commission from Queen Elizabeth and under her flag rendered military service in the Low Country before he came in the Mayflower to North America. Captain Standish was not noted for his piety. He was not even a member of the Pilgrim Church-which, by the way, was called "The First Church of Christ." It is probable that Standish was a Roman Catholic. His daughter, Leora, was religious. One day she found time to do a piece of embroidery in which she worked the following:

"Leora Standish is my name; Lord, guide my heart that I may do thy will! Also, fill my hands with such convenient skill As will conduce to virtue, void of shame, And I will give the glory to thy name."

The Pilgrims wrote their most interesting verses for their tombstones. Those of their number who died the first year after the landing were interred in unmarked graves on account of a fear of the Indians. They were unwilling that the Indians should know how great their mortality was. After 1621 the remains of deceased Pilgrims found sepulture in what is known as Burial Hill. You will be interested in some of the inscriptions on the grave stones. Here is one on a stone that marks the resting-place of a child one month old:

> "He glanced in our world to see A sample of our miserie.'

On the gravestone of a child aged one year and seven days is the following:

> 'Heav'n knows what man He might have made. But we-He died a most rare boy.'

A girl named Fannie Crombie died, after which some one, on her gravestone said this about her:

"As young as beautiful! and soft as young, And gay as soft! and innocent as gay.

Mrs. Plaskett taught a private school for small children, at the same time, as was the custom of her day, doing her spinning. Her mode of punishment was to pass skeins of yarn under the arms of the little culprits and hang them up on nails. The house in which she taught remains, with the nails still in place on which she hung the juvenile rascals. TOf course, this woman had a pretty rough time. She prepared her own epitaph, and this is the way it reads:

'Adieu vain world! I've seen enough of thee; And I am careless what thou sayest of me; Thy smiles I wish not, nor thy frowns I fear; I am now at rest, my head lies quiet here.

A worthy monument is erected to the memory of Captain Myles Standish at Duxbury, where he owned a farm on which he lived, and here he died at the age of seventy-two. His will, still in existence, shows that he was a man of more than average intelligence and that he was financially in good condition. Nor did he employ John Alden to court Priscilla Mullins for him! The Captain did his own courting. His first wife came in the Mayflower, with her husband. His second wife was as doubtless she had before she became Mistress Myles Standish, history fails to record the fact. After she became the Captain's wife she had a name good enough for any woman. If John Alden was not employed to court the beautiful Priscilla for the Captain, then he did not play the Captain false, as Professor Longfellow would have us to believe. It is painful, of course, to be compelled to condemn the Harvard professor, but it is a privilege to stand up in vindication of John!

The Rev. Nathaniel West wrote a poem entitled "The Simple Cobbler of Agawam." In the 181st stanza, the souls of unbaptized infants having forcibly pleaded their innocence of Adam's sin, the divine Judge is represented as replying:

I see that the Prohibition platform says Mc-Kinley is a "conspicuous example of a winedrinker at public banquets and a wine-serving host in the White House." This was not my impression of the President. My information was that however guilty he was in the matter of the army canteen, etc., yet in his personal habits he was all right. Have I and thousands of others been deceived? If so, turn on the light that we may see the man as he is.

Oak Cliff, one of our beautiful suburbs, is happy over their new house. For several years the congregation has been much hindered because of the little house they had. But such is the case no longer, for it has been remodeled at an expense of $2,000, and is now adequate to their wants. J. C. Mason preached for them on opening day, and S. D. Perkinson followed with a short meeting, and the work is taking on new life. G. D. Smith, one of our Central elders, is their worthy pastor.

A new congregation is to be organized in our city. Several years since we established a mission school at the corner of Washington and Thomas, and it is this which has grown into the new church. At the first meeting almost a half hundred were enrolled, and we hope to increase the number to 100 before the final organization. We own a lot and chapel there. B. F. Wilson will preach for them half time and give the other half to city evangelization. The outlook for them and for the work in the city is good.

Another new congregation has been organized by one of our evangelists, D. A. Leak, at Fate, with 38 members. One of their first acts was to make a missionary pledge of $25. This shows them headed in the right direction. R. E. Grabel will preach for them.

Two of our young preachers have recently become entangled in Cupid's net. Edwin D. Hamner was married June 20 to Miss Susie Smith, of Huntsville. The bride is a sister of G. Lyle Smith, our Terrell pastor. And on June 27 Philip F. King, of Corsicana, was married to Miss Mary Frances Thomas, of Hillsboro. They left at once for Chicago University, where they take special courses for the summer.

The great meeting at Gainesville, after 26 days, has closed with 206 additions. Charles Reign Scoville was the evangelist, Prof. Wilson the singer, and J. B. Sweeney the pastor, with a strong church at their backs, and I am not surprised at the glorious results. I would have been surprised had they not been "glorious," for these are the men and conditions which God delights to bless.

Tom Smith is doing a fine work at Smithville, which will result in another new church of about 50 members, and a pastor located for half his

A. J. Bush moves from Abilene to Alvin, where he has a little fruit farm on which he proposes to spend the closing years of his life. He richly deserves one of earth's most pleasant retreats, for his has been a life of unselfish devotion and ceaseless labor in the vineyard of the Lord.

Add-Ran is happy in the prospect of the Girls' Annex, a $10,000 building, with a capacity of 100 boarders. This building is now going up, and will be ready by Sept. 1st, and the prospect is, so say those who ought to know, that it will be full.

The third annual camp meeting of Northwest Texas will be held near Spring Creek in Throckmorton County, August 2-22. The place is ideal for camping, with high ground, fresh water, wood and grass. Every convenience for living will be provided and meals only 25 cents. Randolph Clark and R. R. Hamlin will do the preaching, the former to the church and the latter to the world, and the singing will be in charge of Bro.

and Sister Douthit. If you wish to attend by by rail, write John Ransom, Seymour, for transportation to the grounds. M. M. DAVIS.

New York Letter.

We are glad to say that the American Christian Missionary Society, upon the recommendation of the Board of the Eastern Conference, has decided to support a preacher at Newark, N. J., upon the condition that the Church Extension Board lend the Newark mission money with which to secure lots on which to build a chapel. And this no doubt will be granted if the mission will proceed at once to put up such a building. The Newark brethren have decided to raise a fund for that purpose immediately. It is to be hoped that this may be done without delay so that the work can be undertaken early in the fall. The brethren at Newark are a noble band and the outlook for the work in the city is full of promise. Now, as this work is getting into shape to open up auspiciously, the churches of the Atlantic Coast states should rally to the help of their executive committee and do one of two things in addition to what the American Missionary Society is doing, viz., either support a strong general evangelist in the East or else select some neglected city and open and support a missionary in it. Perhaps the latter would be the better thing to do the present year. There are a number of places about New York City that should be opened in this way as soon as possible.

But let all this work be done with the co-operation of the American Christian Missionary Society which show a strangely sympathetic interest in our Eastern work. The executive committee of the Atlantic States Conference and the American Christian Missionaay Society will work together to redeem the populous cities of the East to Christ our King. Bro. B. L. Smith, our general secretary, is anxious to see this work prosper. On his recent trip to the East we held two conferences concerning the work in general and that of the Eastern states in particular which will no doubt bear good fruit in the future. On his return from Porto Rico he reported Bro. Erwin as doing excellent work at San Juan-in fact he says ours is the most inviting mission in the city and the outlook is full of encouragement. His Sunday-school work is prospering, having opened up a branch school besides the main school that was opened in the beginning. A number of persons have been baptized and others are seeking the way of salvation. We are delighted to hear these goodly reports of our mission work and hope the churches will not allow the work to fall back, but will push it forward and increase its power for good.

Just think of it! There are 60 churches in the Presbytery of New York, and they report just 141 adult, baptisms during the year ending May 1st, 1900. These churches have an enrolled membership of 24,892, and they together with their pastors (and they have some of the ablest speakers in the land) worked twelve months and gained only 141 persons to Christ upon a confession of their faith. Or, to average it, the following are the facts and figures: One church with a membership of 415, 16 officers and a pastor, giving his whole time to the work, were able to win two persons (plus) to Christ by twelve months' labor. Of course, we would not be so ungenerous as to say this represents anything like all that these good people have done-far from it. But the chief business of the church is the saving of lost men, and we who are stewards of the manifold grace of God should not forget our great mission to a lost world. But what is the trouble? Has the gospel lost its power? Is it faithfully preached in the light of the commission of Christ and the history of conversions in the Acts of the Apostles? Or has worldliness so encased the conscience of the average New Yorker that he is impervious to the gospel sword? It is to be feared some truth is implied in all these except the first one, for there are thousands of evidences that the gospel has not lost its power to save men. What is true of the Presbyterians is largely "true of all denominational churches in New York. Too many Christian people seem to be wasting precious time and strength in an endeavor to save their creeds and human systems of church government, whereas this energy should all be directed toward saving men.

Bro. J. S. Myers has returned home to Philadelphia after three months' successful work in the Southwest organizing, evangelizing, etc. During this time the Lord used him in adding 260 souls to the churches where he preached. Upon his return to Philadelphia the church for which he preached formerly gave him a most cordial welcome and left behind them after their visit tokens of their hearty good will in the form of a handsome clock and candelabrum, Dr. E. E. Montgomery making the presentation speech. Bro. Myers is unsettled as to what he will do, though for the present he is supplying different pulpits. It is reported that the First Church, Philadelphia, has called Bro. Frank, recently of Fulton, Mo., and formerly of Nicholasville, Ky. Other ministerial changes have taken place recently in our Eastern field. E. S. Muckley has resigned at Watertown, N. Y., and accepted a call to the church at Bellefontaine, O., and B. A. Jenkins, of the University of Indianapolis, has accepted a call to the church at Buffalo, on Richmond Ave. We are sorry to loose men like Myers and Muckley. but are always glad to welcome such men as Frank and Jenkins. They will do us good in the East. I only wish we might flood the Eastern

Mr. Robert C. Ogden, advertising manager of Wannamaker's store, and withal a thoroughgoing Christian man, said in a recent address in this city, discussing "Some Difficulties that the Plain Man has with His Bible:" "Church organizations are passing through a period of readjustment, and in the process many may lose their faith. For more than 2,000 years men have been discussing the Bible and are discussing it to-day more than ever. Many things taught us in youth must now be set aside as erroneous. While scholarship has been of great benefit to us it has also put a good many difficulties in our way. Conflicts among the scholars aggravate our difficulties; and good men of to-day destroy what good men of the past have done. Now, theology and the church should be absolutely separated, for there is a higher plane for the Church of Jesus Christ than that of theological discussion and dispute. When the church gets to discussing theology it gets beyond its limit. The trouble is we have been putting some product of the human mind before us, such as man-made creeds, catechisms and confessions instead of the pure gospel. The gospel must go to pieces that a logical system may be main-How does this sound from a Presbyterian layman? It is evident that other people are beginning to make the plea we have made so are beginning to make the product long. May such advocates increase.

Richmond Letter.

I have just returned from Williamsburg, Va., where I went to preach the baccalaureate sermon before the graduating class of William and Mary College. I found such a wealth of historic interest attaching to the old college and the old town that I thought your readers might care to know about it.

The college, named after the king and queen, which fact is perpetuated yet in the college colors, orange and white, was established at what was then called Middle Plantation (now Williamsburg), in 1693. In its antecedence it is the oldest of American colleges, the agitation for its organization beginning in the Virginia Assembly in 1619, a year before the Pilgrims landed at Plymouth Rock. The enterprise was delayed, however, on account of the Indian massacres. In its actual operation it is second only to Harvard.

It received its charter direct from the Crown, under the seal of the Privy Council of England. In this it is unique among American colleges, as it also is in its coat-of-arms, which it received from the College of Heralds in London. This bears the date 1694, and is perpetuated yet in the seal of the college.

The first Greek letter society, the Phi Beta Cappa, was organized there December 5, 1776.

Three presidents of the United States have taken their degree there, Thomas Jefferson, James Monroe and John Tyler, whose son, Dr. Lyon G. Tyler, is now president of the institution. George Washington took his engineer's degree, the only degree he ever received, from William and Mary College, and was at one time its chancellor. Of the Cabinet officers furnished by Virginia to the Federal Government, nine have been William and Mary men. Four out of the five judges appointed from Virginia to the Supreme Court of the United States were from the same institution. Among these was John Marshall, who belongs to the nation and to all our future.

Lieutenant-General Winfield Scott took his degree there. Of the twenty-seven United States Senators from Virginia between 1789 and 1860. sixteen were educated at the old college. Of the four Speakers of the House of Representatives furnished by Virginia, three were from the same institution. Virginia has had three Ministers to England, two of them were from William and Mary; and four out of the six Virginia Ministers to France were from the same institution.

The old college bore a most vital and honorable part in the Revolution. It was Richard Bland, an alumnus of William and Mary, who announced the startling doctrine in a pamphlet published in 1766, that "America was no part of the kingdom of England, and had never been united with it except by the common tie of the Crown." It was Dabney Carr, another alumnus, who urged the appointment of committees of correspondence between the colonies in 1773. This was the first step looking toward united action. It was Payton Randolph, another alumnus, who was made president of the first Continental Congress, which met in 1774, thus permitting himself to be made the mark of British resentment. 'It was Thomas Jefferson, another alumnus, who in 1776 wrote the Declaration of Independence. In 1786 it was John Tyler, Sr., another alumnus, who carried through the Virginia Legislature the proposition for the Convention of the States at Annapolis, which led to the Constitutional Assembly at Philadelphia. In 1787 it was Edmund Randolph, another alumnus, who gave direction to the proceedings of the Philadelphia Assembly by submitting the Virginia plan.

This is only an extract from the record. Surely, it is a noble history; and to stand in the chapel, surrounded by old portraits and distinguished names, is almost like treading on holy ground.

The town of Williamsburg is one of the most interesting places, historically, in the whole There are scores of homes there practically as they stood in colonial times. The streets retain their old names-Duke of Gloucester, Nassau, Engiand, France, etc. Bruton Parish Church is these, the successor to the old Jamestown Church. This is perhaps the oldest church in the country, having been organized in 1632. They have several communion services in silver; among them the Jamestown silver, bearing the date 1621, and having the inscription: "Mixe not sacred things with profane;" also a service presented to the church by King George III. The font from which Pocahontas is said to have been baptized is in use yet.

There is a regular gold mine in the old church and in the old homes of the town for the antiquarian, and another one in the records in the old courthouse, built in 1767, for the historian. It is but seven miles to Jamestown in one direction. and but twelve to Yorktown in the other. The old Powder Horn, which was built during the administration of Gov. Spottswood, is still standing. The headquarters of Gen. Washington and Lord Cornwallis and Lafayette are used as homes and are in good repair.

An interesting thing in connection with old Benton Parish Church is the fact that at the very beginning fees were all fixed; for b rial in the chancel, 1,000 lbs. of tobacco or £5, payable to the minister; for burial in the church, 500 lbs. of tobacco, payable to the parish; for a funeral sermon, £2, payable to the minister; for regular christenings and burials, three lbs. of tobacco each, payable to the clerk of the parish; for digging a grave, ten lbs. of tobacco, payable to the sexton. The minister's salary was fixed at 1,600 lbs. of tobacco and cask annually. What this "cask" was for or what it was I have not been able to find out, though I have my sus-CAREY E. MORGAN, picions.

Tribute to Dr. Procter.

To the Editor of the Kansas City Times:

Would you mind if one that has been intimately associated with Dr. Alexander Procter for a long time should think aloud about him in your columns? The space would be highly appreciated by his friends, whose name is legion, and would also show him that though absent from his accustomed place, there are hearts thinking about him, loving him; we would like to tell him we miss him-miss him on the street and in the church; miss his kindly face, benignant smile and spiritual counsel. His long ministry in Independence-nearly forty years-has made his form familiar and has given the community a large interest in his welfare. We love him, the Christian Church of the state loves him as the child loves the parent. I will tell you why Missourians love him. He was born in Missouri, he has spent his life in Missouri, he is a Missourian, proud of his state, of its hills and valleys, of its birds and flowers, of its boundless resources and of its people. It was here he learned to wield the ax and direct the plow; it was here he learned to swing the cradle, as every man knew to his shame who attempted to follow his wide and rapid swath, or to match the broad sweep of his scythe.

It was in this state that he built and developed the large frame that has so long baffled victoriously the enemy of his full, abundant life. It was in Missouri he made his first attempts to tell the wondrous story of the cross, which led him on from heights to heights until he seems to stand in vision on the lofty mountains of God. It was from this state he went in 1845 to Bethany College. West Virginia, as one chosen from among many. Mr. Campbell had made an offer to the state to educate-footing all expenses-one young brother who should give his life to preaching the glad tidings. Mr. Procter, though not an applicant, was chosen and sent. It was to this state he returned in 1848, and to which he has been giving the sum total of his energies, having multiplied the few loaves given him to an abundance that has fed multitude upon maltitude. Who can count the good he has done or measure the high ideals he has implanted in the hearts of old and young?

Although the entire Christian Church of the state has been to some extent educated and strengthened by his loving service, yet but few places ever had him as a minister. The roll is easily called-Lexington, Glasgow, St. Louis, Kansas City, Paris, Independence. In the last mentioned place he has married a whole generation of young people and sent them on their way in love and hope; his consoling word has accompanied these same young people as they laid away in the last resting place all that was mortal of fathers and mothers—a whole generation of them -and he has called quite two generations to walk in the footsteps of his Master-in paths that are righteous and ways that are holy. It is here he has wept with those that wept and rejoiced with those that rejoiced.

These are some of the reasons why Missourians in general and the people of Independence in particular loves the man who sits patiently in his easy chair watching the squirrels in his trees, and occasionally strolling into his yard to pet his flowers. This leads me to tell you another thing about Mr. Procter, which is no secret to those who know him. He is a most ardent lover of nature. He loves the ocean, the mountain and the sky; he loves to watch the coming of the storm, and see the great mass of blackness torn to fragments by the winds; he rejoices in the play of the lightning, as it leaps from mountain cloud to mountain cloud, or strikes the earth with its zigzag tongue. These wonderful exhibitions of power are not more attractive to him than nature in all her more quiet moods. The gentle coming on of spring, the full burst of life in summer, the harvest of autumn time, the winter snows and diamond sleets all express themselves in his responsive spirit. In short, he loves nature in all her moods, and never ceases to hold communion with her. Whether it is the daisy, the rainbow, the storm or the quiet sky, he uses them as a mighty set of symbols with which to spell "God." To him nature is one sublime parable and speaks the love of God to man. After having told you thus much, you need not be told that Mr. Procter is conversant with most of the best that men have had to say on such subjects. He has always kept in close touch with students of nature, of men and of God, and h's religion roots itself in the gamut of being. He feels-

"The world's no blot for us, Nor blank; it means intensely, and means good."

His faith sends its minutest fibers down into the truth that "God dwells in all," and that man is his image. In this little confidential talk I have not mentioned Mr. Procter as a preacher. This is a short story easily told, for he had but one theme—the man Christ Jesus—but to him this short story is the sum of human history. It makes but little difference from what point in the circumference of thought he takes his departure, he is sure to take the radial line and end with Christ, the ideal man. If at times he says things that shock, it is to exalt his Master the more.

One of his favorite texts is: "Till we all come in unity of faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ." He is not a preacher of the law, but of righteousness. He does not call attention to the depths to which one can sink, but to the heights to which one can rise. Let us sum his message in one short sentence: God is life, light and love, and Jesus is God incarnate—follow him. Now, in closing, may I hope that I have given no offense in trying to interpret the heart of one so pure, the intellect of one so strong, and the life of one so simple and helpful.

The Great Famine in India.

In the last 122 years there have been 17 famines in India. There have been eight famines since the reign of Queen Victoria began in 1837. The official report of these famines will give some idea of their severity. From official sources I am able to give the following:

In the famine of 1837-8, 8,000,000 people were affected and 800,000 died. 1860-1, 13,000,000 were affected and upwards of 1,000,000 perished. 1893, a quarter of the population died in some districts. Deaths were enormous; nearly the whole of the laboring population were swept away. 1866, nearly 1,000,000 perished. 1868-'9, 1,250,000 died of hunger. 1876-'8, the mortality exceeded 5,250,000. 1896-'7, 4,500,000 were in receipt of relief at one time. Over 3,000,000 of human beings perished in that miserable time, although £90,000,000 sterling were expended for relief.

Far greater, however, than any of the above is the present famine now devastating India. The extent of the affected area and population is variously reported as being from 60 to 90,000,000 people, greater by far than any famine of the century, while more than 6,000,000 are actually driven from home by starvation.

Notwithstanding the British Government is engaged in many enterprises at home and abroad, the starving in India have been and are being he ped in a colossal way, the like of which has never before been seen. They are now expending $150,000 daily to keep the people alive. Besides what the British Government is doing, the whole civilized world is pouring in money and provision-most generously. Hundreds of thousands of dollars have been sent from America.

I am writing this, however, to say that the need is still most urgent. The rains are coming, but it will be three months before harvests will furnish food. The many months of famine have left the starving millions in a most deplorable condition. Their homes are desolate. They have nothing to begin with. In fact, now is the most distressing condition, so far, in all these months of misery and death. Seed grain, blankets, clothing, cattle, ploughs, with daily bread, are needed, and if not in some measure supplied the lives saved through the past months will finally be lost. It is not enough to have eaten yesterday, we must eat today and to-morrow also. Unless the gifts pour infor three months yet, millions will perish. Now is the time when help is needed most. The misery is indescribable. It is heart-rending. The appeal is to all humanity, but especially to all Christian people. It is the greatest missionary opportunity of the century. Swami Vivakanda said at the World's Fair in Chicago that America was sending the gospel to save starving souls, but cared nothing for the starving bodies. This is as true as most of his utterances. The offerings of American Christians during the last and the present famine is the reply. The free use of the express companies, railways, telegraphs and cables answer eloquently. Let those who have never given do so now, and those who have given once may give Let those who have never given do again and so have the blessing of saving starving souls and bodies. Answer now, for "they're dying to-night, dying where the palm trees grow." G. L. WHARTON.

Facts About Flour.

MADE WHITE BY LEAVING OUT THE PART WHICH HELPS DIGEST.

Modern methods of milling separate the parts of the wheat berry that contain the diastatic element, and furnish only the white flour, made up entirely of starch.

One of the principal elements needed to digest this starch has been left out in the process, and therefore the person who eats much white bread is almost sure to have intestinal troubles, for the starch does not digest properly and must, of necessity, decay and cause all sorts of trouble.

Grape-Nuts Food, on the contrary, is made up of the entire wheat and barley, and the processes of digestion, as shown in the human body, are copied as exactly as possible, in a mechanical way, by the use of moisture, time and warmth. No chemicals or other ingredients are used, but the simple methods scientifically arranged.

In this way the starch of the grain is transformed into grape sugar, and the Grape Nuts Food, which appears in a granular form, shows on the outside of the little granules glittering specks of this grape sugar, which is not put onto the food from the outside, but is a result of the change of the starch into grape sugar, which works out to the surface, very much as the sap of the hickory or maple tree will frequently show in the shape of white sugar on the sawed-off ends of logs.

A handful of Grape-Nuts held to the light will show the little glittering particles of grape sugar. It is naturally and scientifically predigested, therefore the food agrees with the weakest sort of a stomach. It must not be used in large quantities at one meal, for it is concentrated, and overfeeding of even the choicest food is not advisable.

Being perfectly cooked at the factory, the food can be served instantly, either dry or wet, cold or hot. When wanted hot, hot water, milk or cream can be poured over it. There is a definite, distinct and undeniable gain in the nervous energy and vitality when Grape-Nuts food is used.

What hath God wrought through the Disciples of Christ during this century? We who are older in the Disciples' faith have heard this discussed so often from its individuality or individual bearings, we feel it is useless to discuss it further than their women have made their impress on the century. For, when a good brother's proverbial barrel of sermons runs low he will invert the barrel, mount its head and tell us of our Baraks, Sampsons, Gideons, Davids, and Jepthahs, who through faith waxed valliant in the fight, put to flight or muffled the guns of ecclesiastical error, of victories won of which we are no less proud than they and how we feel ourselves rather an "Uncle Sam" among our religious neighbors. It is, however, an inspiring history of a century, causing our neighbors to search the Scriptures "to see if these things be true."

What God hath wrought through the Disciples' women, too, has made its impress on the century and we sing of our Sisters Burgess, Pearre, Christian, White, Lou Payne, Hedges, Bantz and others, not forgetting we have a Moses in our ranks, and we will not hear so much of the "infused knowledge" of this Moses as enthusiasm born of her "inspiration."

While our women did church work, contributed of their means, they did not work with a wholeheartedness until Isaac Errett saw the possibility wrapt in the Disciples' women, seized the opportunity to organize them in their unique way, 'woman's work officered and controlled by women," laying special stress on this feature as an individuality in their work. This liberty of action has shown its wisdom in the phenomenal advance strides the Disciples have taken since their women became coeducators in all work. God is leading women to great fields of religious culture through the Woman's Board. He leaves his impress silently in the program of their literary clubs, invading their domain with a sentiment for his Christ that shall speak later when God shall call them for a more perfect literature, an impression none but women can create where all the gallantries of the mixed club are put aside. The activity of the Disciples' women in the significance of the threefold policy of the leaven, by invading the territories of Noah's sons, leavening the whole world, has created a desire among sister organizations to remodel their societi s along our lines of work and methods. Yet we hear the echo of good brethren saying: "Have we not the power to lead about a sister, a wife, as well as other apostles and the brethren of the Lord, and Cephas? (1 Cor. 9:5.) Just what provoked this retort from Paul the Scriptures are silent; so are we, further than it was a matter between the brethren. "'Tis true, 'tis pity 'tis, tis true," such a spirit of egoism should be found in this year of the Lord nine-

With the spirit of "Uncle Sam's" research to relieve oppressed humanity from the thraldom of university skepticism, the Disciples' women found a means of expansion covered with the dust and mold of a century, hidden away in the archives of Virginia University, laid there by the father of "American expansion" until some Christ-loving woman discovered and saw' the feasibility of the Bible Chair movement.

All religious people and educators say the Disciples' women have made the "hit" of the century in solving the problem of how Christian people are to overcome the question of religious culture and education at our universities. The wisdom of this movement is so manifest, the Disciples' women will soon establish a Bible Chair at the University of Calcutta, the greatest mart of heathendom and the center of their learning. It has been hinted, too, the Disciples' women may take the initial step in Christian union. Already we hear the cry coming from Christian people in heathen lands, "there must be a spiritual union;" on this plea there have come to the Woman's Board in India, Baptists, M. E.s, Episcopals, and lastly a converted Jewess. They have discovered that after all we may be mistaken in our former conceptions of the nature of the union, as were the Disciples in the nature of the kingdom, and when we unite spiritually we will practically speak the same things as the apostles did ic the adjustment of Christ's kingdom. We are told, among all Women's Boards there is a stronger sentiment of union, their differences are becoming more personal, rather than spiritual, as was Paul's in the quotation. Tae promise of redemption was made to woman. Is there no significance in Gen. 3:15? Woman's identity is wrapt in Christ, the seed of Woman, not man. And God is redeeming this promise in the wonderful things he has wrought during this century.

The above statement shows a small decrease over the same period last year except in church offerings.

It has been predicted from the first that there would be a reaction after the great gain of last year. We did not expect as large gifts would be made this year as in the Jubilee Year to the permanent fund, but we did expect a gain in receipts for present use. Upon this basis the board made its appropriations for the year. It enlarged its work, which it thought it had a right to do. Has the field been too greatly enlarged? We find ourselves immediately after our collection without money to pay our missionaries; we lalso find a decrease over last year in receipts. 5 Shall we recall part of our evangelistic force or shall we come to the Kansas City Convention in debt? all say: "Neither!"

A band of missionaties doing the work ours did last year shall neither be recalled nor crippled for lack of means. Our growth last year was greater than the combined growth of all the religious bodies in the United States. Our per cent. of gain per missionary was greater than the combined per cent. of gain per missionary of all the religious bodies. God blessed] us wonderfully. Shall we withdraw from the fields God has honored with an hundredfold increase? Dare we do it? Our plea belongs to America, yet the regreater part of the territory is not even entered. Again, the money we cast on the water in American missions last year will bring six per cent. to Foreign Missions this. Every dollar spent in the United States in converting souls and in [enlarging our church will bring the first year better returns in actual cash than money invested in bonds for all our missionary interests and will increase in its interest-bearing value with each recurring year.

No, we must not decrease our outlay for the cause in America. Shall we come to the convention burdened with debt? No, for it will cripple our efforts in the year to come. There must be no backward steps.

How can we keep our force intact?

1. Let every church which remembered us last year, do so this. Six hundred and fifty churches have given us so far this year which did not give last. If all prove true which did give last year, this will greatly aid.

2. Let each church be determined its offering shall be equal to or beyond last year's. If it has already sent an offering which was smaller it will be an easy matter to supplement.

3. Let every one which gave us last year a personal gift, do so this. Did you give us $100 last year? Send us a check for $100 this. Did you join with the 4,500 who gave $1 each last year? Do so at once this.

4. Let all those who love the cause of "primitive Christianity" send us a personal offering.

Let preachers, members, all with one accord pour money into the treasury of the American Christian Missionary Society and we will keep every worker in the field, come to Kansas City out of debt and make a report of victories won for Christ which will make all hearts glad.

The first district M. C. M. S. held its convention with the mission church at Adrian June 27-29. The C. W. B. M., S. S. and C. E. were represented besides the general district work. Prof. G. P. Coler, Ann Arbor; Chas. B. Newman, Detroit; H. C. Patterson, Indianapolis: Alex McMillan, state corresponding secretary; J. M. L. Campbell and wife, Detroit, district managers; Lucy H. Weeks, Ann Arbor, and several others had papers or delivered addresses. The meeting was a splendid one for the first in several years. C. W. B. M. Quarterly Meeting.

The union quarterly meeting of the C. W. B. M. at the Central Christian Church, Tuesday, June 19, was well attended and an enjoyable program presented. "Snapshots from Home Fields" and "Kodak from Foreign Fields," brought the work and workers clearly before us. The "Junior Congress" suggested some practical ideas in relation to this important branch of our work. and the address by Bro. W. A. Moore, of Beulah Church, on "Some Incentives to Missionary Effort," gave inspiration and encouragement, for which we owe him a debt of gratitude only to be repaid by increased zeal and earnestness in the work. The reports from the auxiliaries showed increase in membership and in receipts both for general fund and special work.

Burris A. Jenkins at Buffalo.

The pastoral labors of Burris A. Jenkins with the Richmond Avenue Church of Christ, Buffalo, commenced on Lord's day, July 1, 1900. Before proceeding to the platform, and at the request of the official board, the Rev. Anson G. Chester addressed him in hearty words of welcome, to which he most appropriately responded. A novel feature in this greeting was the rising of the congregation and the stretching forth of their right hands, in response to the request of the speaker to that effect, in token of their acceptance of Bro. Jenkins as their pastor. The two sermons delivered by him upon this first day of his pastorate were received by large congregations with great satisfaction and made an impression which is likely to remain. We feel that we have drawn a prize in Bro. Jenkins, and that his pastorate is sure to be successful. May God add his blessing!

Can Sleep Now

SINCE LEAVING OFF COFFEE.

"Up to five years ago I had used coffee all my life, but was finally forced to give it up on account of the way it acted on me. Right after drinking it I would be taken with a dizzy headache and sour stomach and have to make a cup of strong tea before I could go about my work.

Two years ago I started on Postum Food Coffee and since finding how to make it properly I would not exchange it for the best coffee I ever saw. My old troubles have disappeared entirely. I have gained considerable flesh, and what is still better, sleep perfectly at night, which was not the case while using coffee.

When I first used Postum, my husband complained of its being tasteless, so I tried to use more of it, but as that did not help matters I tried more boiling, which proved to be the right thing, and now it is delicious." Mrs. W. A. Eckels, Siston, Cal.

Ohio Notes.

We are now at the beginning of the dullest season in our state mission work. From this time on until November, receipts are the smallest of any season of the year, and about the only way funds can be gathered at all is to go into the field after them. Work among the churches usually goes slower at this season of the year than at any other time, and results are not gained so rapidly in our mission work. Nevertheless, we enter this season with a very bright outlook. A number of our missions are having additions quite regularly, and the outlook throughout the state is hopeful.

The work on the Rossford building has so far progressed that it is now being used for services. Of course, the building is not completed, but it is enclosed, and makes very comfortable summer quarters. L. A. Warren, the pastor, has taken hold of the work with spirit, and we may look for excellent results.

W. D. VanVorrhis, formerly of Lowell, Ind., has taken charge of the work at our South Akron mission. Brother VanVorrhis is a graduate of Hiram College and of Butler University, and has taken postgraduate work at Chicago University. He is one of the best educated of our young men, and few men have a stronger personal influence for righteousness than he. We feel confident that Brother VanVorrhis will make a success of the South Akron work. There are some hindrances to the work here, but this is a growing suberb of the rapidly growing city of Akron. Our mission is the only church in that immediate section of the city. There is at present a little doubt as to whether they will be able to hold their present building site. The school board is looking for a location for a large school building, and have taken options upon all the property about there, including the lot on which our chapel is located. We may lose the location, which is a most excellent one, but if we do we shall immediately purchase another lot and begin to build.

O. L. Cook, our state evangelist, has begun work at Barberton. Many Disciples live here, who have been members of our churches in other places. A number have gone into other churches, but will be ready to take hold earnestly with our people as soon as the work is thoroughly started. We have no building, but the people interested in the establishment of a church in this thriving new city have purchased a lot in one of the finest locations that could be found. Lumber has been purchased and a tabernacle about 60 feet square has been erected. It is more like a wooden tent than anything else, and is a very comfortable place for meetings during the hot summer weather. The expense in all is about $168. I visited there on Sunday last and found a small but enthusiastic gathering of people and a determination on the part of all to make the work succeed. Brother Cook is just the man for this kind of work. The Clark fund has agreed to pay the salary of the pastor for the first year, while the church is providing for a building. It is one of the most hopeful outlooks we have found in Ohio.

The Bedford Church is planning to build during the summer. They will dispose of their old location and buy another in the heart of the town and put upon it a building worth about five or six thousand dollars. A little more than $3,000 of this money is already subscribed. E. E. Curry, the pastor there, is pushing matters with might and main.

The building enterprise of the Glenville Church is moving on successfully. They report that finances for the building are coming in nicely and that the work is rapidly progressing. They expect to be able to use the Sunday-school room upon the first Lord's day in August.

The meeting now being held by State Evangelist Allan Wilson, at Washington C. H., is moving on to increasing success. The last report was by telegraph, and showed 94 accessions; 88 of them by baptism. This has proven a hard field, but the meeting has been very successful and has strengthened the church materially. They close Wednesday of this week.

Kansas for Christ-Christ for Kansas!

Brethren of Kansas, did you know that this has been one of the most successful missionary years we have eyer had? The foundation of work so ably laid during the ministry of Bro. O. L. Cook. as field superintendent, has been strengthened and built upon by his worthy successor. The many church difficulties settled, congregations put to work, church houses redeemed from mortgage debt and sale, pastors located and general allround enthusiasm and improvement speak eloquently of Bro. W. S. Lowe's untiring efforts. Six days out of every seven in the field, absent from home and family, sacrificing, laboring, living for Christ's sake. More money has been expended in the field than for many year previous and less expended in office work. The missionary year must close Aug. 1st, two months earlier than usual. This will cut off the usual August and September offerings from this year's work and record. It is necessary that we close the year out of debt. To do this will require energetic action on the part of our brethren over the state. Gladden the hearts of those who have sacrificed so much by coming promptly with your apportionments and gifts for the cause. Gladden your own hearts by doing your duty. It is God's call-will you answer? The great-hearted people of Kansas heard India's call for bread and were touched. The call for the bread of life from our own people is borne to our ears. Let us bring of our abundance to the Lord's work that they may be filled. Shall we not appreciate the great and supreme privilege and blessing of preaching the gospel in Kansas-our Judea? Brethren, what will you do before August 1st?

Missouri Bible-school Notes.

Marshall has remitted first quarter in the new year. Hannibal has sent in their $75 pledge in full, enabling us to meet every obligation for June, with funds in the treasury. What a favor if others would do us likewise.

Bro, John Giddens reports that the work at Green Springs is so well alorg toward the new house that there will be no further trouble. He is now at Montevallo. The prospects for a great year's work are bright with one of our men.

The Boys' and Girls' Rally Day this year will be kept by more Missouri Bible-schools than ever before, and should be made a great day by them all. B. L. Smith, Y. M. C. A. building, Cincinnati, Ohio will furnish you the needed supplies free gratis if, you will order them, and you should do so.

The Home Department is becoming more and more an actuality with us, this department being organized at Liberty and Bowling Green, where J. H. Hardin and S. W. Marr, with their superintendents, always seek the very best means by which to advance the kingdom of God.

Our July board meeting, with every member present, took in consideration the districts, the field force, the funds in prospect, and have outlined the work as given in my last notes.

R. B. Havener, our evangelist in the southwest district, has just revived the school at Edgewood and has revived the church generally at Calhoun. The house had been closed for a year, but now all the departments are at work and W. W. Warren has been called to their help, and you know what that means for the little band. Their Bible-school is again on its feet with a good superintendent, and we have hopes for Calhoun once more. This is the work that zeal can do. While holding the meeting he talks Bible-school, and the revival of one revives the other, thus saving the school and church to the brotherhood, and our county super intendents, knowing the field, should use our evangelists to this good end. Will they not kindly do so, helping all at once?

Mt. Zion, Marion, is one of the best country schools in all Missouri, and its efficient superintendent, L. C. Hendren, and the minister, C. S Brooks, are two of our best friends. The church house is undergoing general repairs, and will have one of the most attractive auditoriums in the West when completed, this week, but there is to be no cu'ting off in its giving to good work.

If any of those writing for souvenirs failed to receive them, or if any to whom we promised to send them did not get them, notify this office without hesitation and you shall be supplied by return mail. Hear? The first quarter is now due, and I hope the schools will not wait for the notice.

State Mission Notes.

There are some men who know how to give you a happy surprise in such a hearty way that it adds to the pleasure of the astonishment. This is true of Brother W. F. Richardson, pastor of the First Church, Kansas City, when he came into the office and turned in a check for $197 for state mission work from the First Church. He was as happy in giving this good help as we were in receiving it. I was not in the office at the time but the office secretary received such a shockof joy-that she had to write me of it at once, and I had a good big piece of a regular old-fashioned Methodist love feast, all by myself. This is by far the largest contribution to State Missions this year, and is the result of a great mission rally in which over $1,400 was obtained for mission purposes.

Other churches have gone beyond their apportionments lately, such as Monroe City, which sent us $35, and Odessa, which sent us $30. At the first of these we are not surprised; they have been among the warmest friends of the work for a number of years, constantly increasing their contributions till it has reached this handsome sum. The latter, though, was a real, genuine surprise. It is more than twice as much as the church has given for a number of years. To say that we are grateful to these friends for their help is to feebly express our feelings. May God bless them all. But for these generous helpings our work would have been in the closest straits, but we shall now be able to pay the men up to date.

But this is not all that is needed. We need the money for the next three months for the men already employed. We must also increase our force. We must help another place in St. Louis. We ought to put an extra man in Jasper county at once. Several preachers have written me, splendid men, saying that they are ready to go if their support is assured.

But there is the difficulty, the money is not in sight: Have we not some great-hearted, generous friend of God in the state who would support a men in that section for the next three months? $150 will do it, and what a glorious investment it would be! Both the Methodist and Baptist people have found men among them willing to do this, and they are doing a noble work. What of us? Are we any poorer than they? Are we less liberal than they? Have they any more of the real spirit of sacrifice than we? I cannot believe it. Surely, God has blessed some of us with the means, and we ought to give it for that purpose. The population of that county is nearly double what it was a year ago. Twelve months ago there were 17 saloons in Joplin, now there are 40, more than twice as many. We are moving to build a $15,000 house in that place, but there is room for the immediate organization of another church. W. F. Turner says it ought to be done and done now. Then there are the towns spoken of in Bro. Oldham's letter. there not a message in these things that will strike the heart of some one with the means? I am praying hourly for the means to enter this field. Who will answer? T. A. ABBOTT.

A Call for Our Colored Brethren.

The publicity committee of our next National Convention has received the following for publica-

A CALL TO THE MEMBERS OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCHES OF THE UNITED STATES (COL.)

DEARLY BELOVED BRETHREN IN CHRIST JESUS— Greetings: The Annual National Conventions of the Christian Churches will meet in Kansas City, Missouri, October 11th to 18th, 1900.

Being a part of this great organization and believing that we can learn to perfect our work better by always being in touch with our (white) brethren, and realizing how much we who attended the Jubilee Convention at Cincinnati, Ohio, last year were benefited by thus being in touch, we resolved then to meet with our other brethren each year wherever they meet.

The matter of rates on the railroads being also a thing of much difficulty, worry and annoyance when small bodies are to be accommodated, has along with a great many advantages which can be derived and which cannot now be mentioned, impelled us to the taking of this step.

Without commending ourselves for wisdom, foresight or judgment, we believe that this is the best step yet taken to get together a representative gathering of our colored brethren with the least trouble.

The white brethren have already extended to us every courtesy with promise of further assistance to make our meeting a success and the colored brethren of Kansas City, Mo., and Kansas City, Kan., have written that they are willing to give free entertainment and do everything in their power to make our meeting a success.

We, therefore, the executive committee of the G. C. M. S. (colored), send out this invitation to all our brethren to meet us in Kansas City, Mo., for organization and work, October 11th, 1900, at which time we hope to also report the raising of $1,000 for Christ and humanity.

Every delegate and visitor is asked to come prepared to contribute one dollar and every congregation to send at least five dollars.

Information on program and business can be sent to and obtained from Prof. T. Augustus Reid, State Normal School, Frankfort, Kv.

On entertainment and homes, from Eld. Wm. Alphin, 933 Walker Avenue, Prof. John R. Smith, 1009 Nebraska Avenue, or Eld. Wm. Hancock, 1119 Oakland Avenue, Kansas City, Kansas.

On railroads and transportation, from Bro. G. W. Muckley; T. A. Abbott, A. A. Buxton, publicity committee, Kansas City, Mo., or from the state evangelist or state corresponding secretary of (white) C. M. S. of your state.

Read everything published in our papers by our other brethred on the conventions. It will have the same general bearing on our work.

And we, then, as workers together with him, beseech you in the name of Christ Jesus to meet us in Kansas City, Mo., at the time appointed.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE: Dr. M. F. Robinson, Kentucky, president G. C. M. S.; Jas. R. Lauderback, Virginia, vice-president G. C. M. S.; J. H. Hart, Ohio, secretary G. C. M. S.; D. A Cruel Accusation.

To charge the Christian missionaries in China with istigating the present riots in that country is most cruel and unjust. It is no new thing to charge all calamities and misfortunes that come upon heathen countries upon the few Christians who are trying to spread a knowledge of Christ around there. In the early days of Christianity every drowth and every plague that visited the countries where Christians lived was charged to their account, and for these things the innocent had to suffer every form of torture and finally martyrdom, and be it remembered to their everlasting credit that they suffered all these things uncomplainingly and even gladly, counting it all joy to suffer shame for his name.

It was this same condition of affairs that made it possible for Nero to fire Rome and then incite the mob to murder the Christians for his own crime. That the old, cruel, false cry is taken up to-day shows a survival of things other than the fittest.

We are reminded of the Oriental proverb: "First, the missionary, then the consul, then the general." That this order of events is often the case we cannot deny, and that Christianity has been misunderstood and suffered much on this account is also true; but to blame Christianity for the evil that follows the consul and general is quite as unreasonable as to charge them with burning Rome.

Modern commercialism and militarism take early advantage of the opening made by missionaries, and entering these localities, begin their methods, that are not Christian, and the missionary has to bear the blame.

Every mission opens up a little center for commerce, and then comes the trade of his own country and the evils it brings, and the heather look upon this as the fruits of Christianity. When, as is so often the case, the same ship that brings the missionary brings the saloon, more deadly than the cannon, it is not so strange that the pagan associates them in after times. If it is true that within one year after the American flag was hoisted in Porto Rico and the American missionary landed there that the three saloons grew to be three hundred, will not these people in their history associate the flag, the missionary and the saloon? We cannot hide the fact that these results do hinder our missions and becloud the splendor with which Christianity would otherwise shine.

Now as to the Chinese charges, all the people, whether native or foreign, that are slaughtered are Christians. But do we thus judge that they are murdered because of their religion? We know that the Chinese as a nation are totally indifferent as to religion. When the old Chinese philosopher said to the missionary: "All Joss good; your Joss good for you; my Joss good for me-all Joss good," he [voiced their sentiment on religion. But they believe that the missionary is merely the agent of the secular government by which it achieves its aggressions, and as they hate foreign aggressions their vengeance falls on the missionary. Because of this suspicion they declare that these Christian nations have taken possession of nearly all of their ports and are now threatening to apportion among themselves the entire country; hence the terrible slaughter at this very moment.

The church is confronted with enormous diffi-culties. She cannot abandon her missions. She cannot cease to "go" into every nation. What is to be done? This is true: until Christian nations are This is true: until Unristian nations are Christian in reality—Christian politically, commercially, socially—the slaughter of Christian missionaries will inevitably continue. It is the old, old story—the innocent suffering for the guilty.

Am I Doing My Best?

J. H. STARK

Am I true to the trust my Savior has given,
As toilsomely on thro' life's journey I go?
Is my back toward the world, my face toward heaven?

Do I daily kind deeds in Jesus' name do?
Do I frequent the place where brethren oft gather
To sing the sweet songs in praise of our Lord?
Do I send a request to my Heavenly Father,
Desiring my will with His to accord?

My Savior has bidden me trust in His leading
And do whatsoever I do in His name,
From the storehouse of truth my soul ever feeding,

May lean on His word and His promises claim.

In the rush and the noise, the strife and the worry
Of business affairs that vex and annoy
Do I take time to drop a word that is cheery,
In the name of my Lord, to give some one joy.

Do I give of my means to publish the story— The gospel of Christ—at home and abroad? Am I striving to climb from grace into glory By faithful adherence to God's blessed Word? Am I shunning all appearance of evil That my daily example may tell for the right?

Do I love to do right rather than revel

In pastimes that're sinful, in pleasures that blight?

Dear Father, do take my poor, sinful weakness
And in place of it give me pure, simple trust;
Take from me pride and give me the meekness
That will entomb self 'neath humility's dust.
Help me to daily, thro' faith in my Savior,
Earnestly work, for the night draweth nigh;
Striving to live in thy blessed favor,
Take me at last to thy saints' rest on high.

"Unto the Least of These."

MINNIE E. HADLEY.

"No, mother, I shall not go to Pierre Ribeaut's party to-night. Our new minister's powerful Christian sermons have wrought a great change in both my mind and heart since I ordered that elaborate party dress from Madame Hernaud's, four weeks ago. It's just as he says: 'Plainness and simplicity will characterize the dress of every real Christian.'

"The woman who spends two hundred dollars for a dress," continued Marion Wright, her large black eyes flashing with an enthusiasm growing out of intense earnestness, "does so because she prefers her own happiness to others," and not for the employment it affords, as the same amount invested benevolently for cheaper dresses would offer quite as much of the latter.

"For my part, I'm sick to death of all these furbelows, this fuss, finery and frivolity, which the social world demands of us. I tell you, mother, its positively appalling to look about us and see what a small proportion of the great mass of professing Christians are genuinely so at heart!"

The elaborate piece of embroidery work slid from Mrs. Wright's lap to the floor, and a shadow of perplexed surprise and displeasure darkened her face as she looked toward her daughter, who also had stopped work at her writing desk and sat thoughtfully gazing at a beautiful copy of "The Christ," by Hofmann, which adorned the wall of their handsomely furnished library.

"Marion," said Mrs. Wright at length, "I cannot understand why you should suddenly become so dissatisfied with the Christianity which your own mother has practiced for almost forty years, and which all of your friends and acquaintances are practicing and professing to-day. It cannot be that they are all wrong and you alone are right.

"I am not saying that they are all wrong, mother. They may be all right so far as they go, but how many of the members in our church to-day even make any attempt to fulfill the law of Christ?"

"The science of theology has been elaborated from the first great commandment of Christ: 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul and with all thy mind,' and the church has studied it assiduously, as it should, but how about the second great commandment: 'Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself'-the elaboration of which is sociology or social science? Is it being either studied or practiced when thousands of professing Christian women will spend fifteen hundred dollars a year for clothing and men who are also professed Christians will squander that much and more on a single evening's entertainment, as Pierre Ribeaut is doing to-night? Why, fifteen hundred dollars would endow a permanent scholarship in the Hampton Institute, or send one hundred boys from the slums of New York City to Western homes where the most of them would become honest, industrions and useful citizens. Think of the good that would grow out of such an expenditure!

"No, mother, I shall not mock God by attending any party that grows out of such lavish expenditure nor by countenancing any man who, like Pierre Ribeaut, makes long prayers on Sundays, gives large donations to the church to be popular and then grinds and starves his poor, oppressed employees six days out of the week to make it all back again. Such men are liars and hypocrites!"

Marion brought her plump white fist to the desk with a bang as she uttered the last expression and her beautiful black eyes shot forth tremendous volleys of righteous indignation.

Mrs. Wright answered with a deep, prolonged sigh. There was no use trying to persuade her daughter. She knew that very well. But for weeks she had been cherishing, away down in her heart of hearts, the secret hope that somehow this party might open up a new future fo Marion.

Ever since Morgan Wright's death, ter years ago, it had been the widowed mother's ruling ambition to make a brilliant match for her daughter, not only because they were in need of a larger income, but also because Marion's dark, flashing beauty, exquisitely musical voice and brilliancy of mind seemed to entitle her to something more than the average man.

The party was given in honor of Hareld Ribeaut, who had long been absent in Australia, and who, owing to his father's rapidly declining health would arrive on the evening train and in a few days assume full control of the immense manufacturing business of his father, Pierre Ribeaut, king of money-makers.

Mrs. Wright had secretly hoped that some affinity might develop between the wealthy young millionaire and her superior daughter, but Marion's recent repugnance for his father, her ideas of dress reforms, incumbent duties toward the poor, etc., seemed to reduce such a match to a mere myth, and the mother's prolonged sigh was but the final expiration of the last breath of a dying hope.

So it was decided; and eight o'clock of the same evening found Marion Wright entering the door of the large stone church which stood just across the street from her home. It was prayer-meeting night and the same faithful few were in attendancesome twelve or fifteen good old souls, each of which Marion knew and loved, a few zealous young people, and to-night there was a stranger, a large stalwart man, with darkauburn hair and a thick growth of likecolored beard. He was kneeling in one of the back pews as Marion entered, apparently engaged in the profoundest religious devotions, although the services had not yet begun.

"He must be puzzled with the solution of some perplexing moral question," thought Marion as she noticed him pacing to and fro in the vestibule after the meeting was over. But just then something [happened which caused her to forget all about him, for just as she stepped upon the sidewalk a little ragged urchin darted out from the depths of a shadow and seized her hand.

"Mother's a dyin'," squeaked a hoarse little voice. "An' she wants yer to come. Ef yer got any close es'll do Iter bury er in, she says will yer bring 'em? She's only got ther ole calicer she's been wearin'."

It was little Jamie Davis from "Factory Flats," the homes of Pierre Ribeaut's employees, and one of the poorest quarters of the city.

Marion had made the acquaintance of the needy family but a few weeks before and learned that Mrs. Davis had killed herself by long hours and hard work in the factory. Her wages were uncommonly low and Jamie and Meg, aged ten and six respectively, were dependent upon her for support.

"Wait here just one minute Jamie."

Marion's home was only a few steps from the church, and the next moment she stood at the open door of her room, where the first thing that met her eyes was the white silk party dress which had just come from Madam Hernand's.

A pair of sharp scissors, guided by her iconoclastic spirit, letting out a puff here and ripping off a furbelow there, very quickly reduced the fussy, stylish party dress to a plain white silk shroud for Mrs. Davis. Bundling up a few other necessary articles, she rejoined Jamie and they were soon hastening along the beautiful residence street in the direction of Factory Flats.

As they passed the Ribeaut mansion it was easy to discern that the festivities had already commenced. Gorgeous lights streamed forth from the large windows and beautiful strains of music were wafted upon the night air.

A very dandified and foppish looking young gentleman with an air of the most exalted self-importance had just emerged from a cab and was entering the yard.

"Ha, Ribeaut, is it you?" she heard one of the gentlemen accost him.

"And that's the renowned Harold Ribeaut," thought Marion, "the business man who is to assume control of all those immense factories. Great God! What are we coming to when such men are given power to crush the very souls of those who serve them?"

They had reached the poorer quarters of the city, where the lights were dim and the passengers few, when Marion was seized by the vague perception that some one was following them. All the way along heavy footsteps had sounded just behind them, and now as she stopped to rearrange her bundle the footsteps stopped too, and she seemed to discern in the darkness the stalwart figure of the stranger seen at church.

They hastened onward in silence to their destination, where poor Mrs. Davis already lay a corpse.

Marion, assisted by the willing hands of some of the neighbor women, had arrayed the body in its last earthly garment, and the mournful watch was already begun, when a gentle rap at the outer door startled them, and the next moment a strange man had stepped upon the threshold. It was the auburn-haired stranger again. Immediately his eyes were riveted upon Marion, who held the sleeping, curly-headed Meg in her lap, with the little tear-stained face pressed close to her bosom, while the other arm was thrown lovingly about the stricken form of heart-broken Jamie who was crying bitterly, with his head upon her shoulder.

It was a beautiful picture, such as angels mighs well have envied, and no wonder that the stranger stood gazing at her a few moments without uttering a single word.

"I understand there has been a death here," he said in low sympathetic tones, "and have come to offer assistance. If you have not yet arranged for an undertaker I will gladly attend to the matter as I have a somewhat personal interest in the deceased."

He was a young man, apparently not more than thirty, and his kind blue eyes beamed so lovingly upon the little children that Marion's confidence was immediately won.

"You are very kind," she said. "We are in need of a man's assistance."

"I understand that it's the old story," he continued, "another victim of overwork at the factory. As I am something of a sociologist, and as you are better acquainted with conditions here, I should like to ask if you think it possible for the employer of these people to institute any sudden and definite reform that would work for the betterment of their conditions?"

"Most assuredly I do," answered Marion, with quick flash of her large black eyes. "O, if I were only in young Harold Ribeant's shoes for just one week!"

"May I ask what would be the consequences?" he inquired with an interested smile.

"I should increase the starvation wages of these poor people at least 25 per cent.; I should cut the working period from fifteen hours down to eight; I should give them houses to live in instead of pigpens and ratholes."

"Anything else?" he asked, still smiling, as Marion paused for breath.

"Yes; I should then build for them a 'Palace of Delight' for social gathering and æsthetic culture, such as Walter Besant speaks of in his "All Sorts and Conditions of Men," and which is actually realized in London to-day."

"I hope your ideas may also be realized," he said, looking more serious, "and very soon, too."

"And now I must bid you good-night. I shall send an undertaker at once. May God bless you in your noble work of benevolence!"

It all seemed like a strange dream to Marion when, next day, she tried to recall the words of her new acquaintance.

About noon of the same day, what was her surprise when a message boy delivered the following note:

"My Dear Miss Wright:—Your visions of reform have already become realities. I have increased the wages of my employees 25 per cent.; the working day is shortened to eight hours and I have one hundred thousand dollars ready for the 'Palace of Delight.' If agreeable to you I shall call this evening and give you definite information concerning my plans."

Harold Ribeaut.

Marion could scarcely credit her own enses and during the remainder of the

DRUNKENNESS CURED.

An eminent St. Louis physician has given a positive answer to the oft asked question, is drunk enness a disease, or is it simply a temptation that cannot be resisted by a vast number of the human race? The physician in question is Dr. Ozias Paquin, who for years has been a practicing physician in the City of St. Louis. He has answered this question by taking five of the worst drunkards that could be found and cured them of all further appetite for intoxicating drinks. The five cases were all beyond middle age and they had sunk into the deepest pit of drunkenness, with the odor of drink about them so obnoxious that it was almost impossible to stand within speaking distance. He not only cured them of all desire for intoxicating drink, but at the same time placed upon their cheek the flush of health, and into their eyes the light of happiness, and took from their person the odor of whiskey. It was almost a miracle, for he had raised five cases from degradation into the sunshine of health and happiness. Dr. Paquin has cured hundreds of patients who were relapses from other treatments, and in every instance he cured these patients, and they have remained cured for months and years. It can therefore be said that the Paquin Treatment is a permanent cure, and not a temporary one, for the patient never relapses to his former condition. We know of no more humane work being done at the present time than that which Dr. Paquin is doing, and it is the duty of every reader to assist Dr. Ozias Paquin in his noble work, and if any reader has brother, sister, husband, father or friend in whose system lurks the disease of drunkenness, he should at once send their name to Dr. Paquin or see that they either visit or place themselves in communication with the Ozias Paquin Immune Co., Suite 1113 Chemical Bidg., St. Louis. afternoon two pictures were constantly coming and going before her mental vision—one was of the fashionable dandy seen at the Ribeaut mansion, the other of the plain, Christian sociologist seen in the hovel; and it was not wholly a surprise when, as she descended to the parlor later at the announcement of Harold Ribeant, she found the latter awaiting her instead of the former.

Harold Ribeaut had been converted to Christianity in the wilds of Australia and on arriving in the city that evening had preferred to attend prayer-meeting and there invoke God's blessing upon the great work which he was about to undertake, before appearing upon the scene of revelry, the lavish expenditure for which he could in nowise approve. As he waited in the vestibule he heard little Jamie's plea for aid and was impelled by a stronger desire to minister to the dying woman than to appear at the party. The young Mr. Ribeaut to whom Marion had taken such a dislike was a distant relative from a neighboring city.

The long rows of neat, white cottages for Harold Ribeaut's employees were soon constructed; a few years later the "Palace of Delight" was completed and it thus became the crowning object of Harold Ribeaut's life, with the assistance of his wife, Marion, to make better and happier the lives of those who served him.

His aim is to study the needs and wants these people, to think of their happiness as well as his own, thereby fulfilling the law of Christ, who has said: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

"Judge Not"-III.

T. H. BLENUS.

If God will punish those who encroach upon his divine prerogatives he will most certainly condemn those who in their conduct trample upon the rules of justice and equity. There can be nothing more unjust than to usurp over our equals a right which we do not possess, and the exercise of which is strictly forbidden us. What is more unjust than after erecting this tribunal without authority to disregard in our decisions every rule of right and equity, to condemn on the most vague reports and frevolous surmises, to condemn without investigation, and from the impulse of unhallowed passion? What can be more unjust than to constantly do to others what would overwhelm us if they did it to ourselves.

Love, the queen of the graces, cannot reign in the hearts of those who inhumanly and unrighteously judge their neighbor. What is a Christian without charity? An uncharitable Christian is an anomalous character. It is an evil heart destitute of the the very first principles of a vital faith in Christ and a desire to imitate him which is perpetually occupied with the real or imaginary failings of a brother or a neigbor. The Apostle James has written: "He shall have judgment without mercy that hath shewed no mercy." Instead of cultivating the disposition of passing judgment on those around us our deepest care should be employed in repairing as much as possible the evils of life, in cherishing the sentiments of sympathy and love and in striving to bring under the favor and approbation of God the erring, the straying and the sinful. Without the mercy of the Almighty One the most righteous would despair of salvation; without it the repentent sinner would in vain flatter himself with the hopes of forgiveness.

In our present state of existence, where human nature is so frail, where the very best have their weak side and the strongest armor has its open joints, and where so many events happen which give occasions to the passions of men to manifest themselves, there is great scope for the exercise of the spirit of meekness and forbearance. Many opportunities present themselves to us to throw a veil over those infirmities which sometimes are inseparable from the best natures and to frame an excuse for those errors and indiscretions which do not proceed from a bad neart. To the errors of his friends Christ was gentle and mild. When his disciples were prompted by a a fal e zeal, of which many of his so-called disciples are equally as guilty to-day, they asked him to command fire from heaven and lext week we will have some letters n the members of our Advance Society. the meantime, here is the second chapter Mr. Thackeray's story. You will rememthat little Prince Giglio's uncle had bed him of his throne; and that this le's daughter, Angelica, had a maid ned Rosalba, who said she was a lion's er, a very strange statement certainly. will hear more about it.

The Lion's Sister.

J. BRECKENRIDGE ELLIS.

nd now let us speak of Prince Giglio, nephew of King Valoroso XXIV. As as he had a smart coat to wear and ey in his pocket, or rather to take out is pocket, for he was very good-natured, young prince did not care for the loss of crown. The king always wished that elica and Giglio should marry; so did lio; so did Angelica sometimes, for she ight the prince very handsome, brave good-natured. But then, you know, she so clever and knew so many things, and Giglio knew nothing (he would not n Latin or mathematics) and he had no versation. When they looked at the s what did Giglio know of the heavenly ies? One sweet night Angelica said king at the big dipper): "There is the at bear."

Where?" says Giglio. "Don't be afraid, elica. If a dozen bears come I will kill Oh, you silly creature," said she, "you good, but you are not very wise."

Then they looked at the flowers Giglio utterly unacquainted with botany. en the butterflies passed Giglio knew ning about them, being as ignorant of omology as I am of algebra. So you see, igh Angelica liked Giglio pretty well, she pised him on account of his ignorance. hink she valued her own knowledge ner too much; finally, when nobody else there, Angelica liked the prince well ugh. King Valoroso was very delicate, so fond of good dinners (which were pared for him by his French cook), that as supposed he could not live long. Now, idea of anything happening to the king ack the prime minister and the governess h horror, for they thought: "When ace Giglio marries Angelica and comes the throne, what a pretty position we ll be in, we who have always been und to him! We shall lose our positions in rice!" So these unprincipled people inted a hundred cruel stories about Prince lio; how he actually wrote Valoroso h two ls; how he went to sleep in rch; how he owed ever so much money the pastrycook's; how he was always ng. So did the king go to sleep at rch and eat too much! And if Giglio ed a trifle for tarts, who owed him the whole crown and throne and treasury, I should like to know? Tale-bearers (in my humble opinion) had much better look at home. King Valoroso had his own reasons for disliking his nephew; and for those readers who ask why? I beg (with the permission of their dear parents) to refer them to Shakespeare's pages, where they will find why King John disliked Prince Arthur. Two villains (who shall be nameless) wished the court physician to kill Giglio outright; but he only bled him and kept him in bed for months, till he grew as thin as a ghost.

One day an artist showed Angelica the portrait of a young man in armor. "Who is this?" asked the princess. "I never saw any one so handsome."

"That," said the painter, "is Prince Bulbo, Crown Prince of Crim Tartary."

"What a prince!" thought Angelica; "so brave, so young, so calm-looking!"

"The Prince Bulbo has given away his royal heart," said the painter.

"And to whom?" asked her royal highness, with a sigh.

"I am not at liberty to name the princess he loves," answered the painter.

"But you may tell me the first letter of it," gasped the princess.

"Your royal highness may guess."

"Does it begin with a Z?" asked Angelica. The painter said it wasn't Z; then she tried a Y, then an X; and went backwards through almost the whole alphabet. When she came to C it wasn't C, and she grew very much excited; then she came to B; it wasn't B! She faintly whispered, "Can it be A?"

"It is A; and though I may not tell her, I may show you her portrait." Leading the princess to a gilt frame the painter drew a curtain which was before it. O, goodness! The frame contained a lookingglass! and Angelica saw her own face."

After that Angelica gave no more thought to poor Giglio. She thought day and night (when not asleep) of this handsome Bulbo whom she had never seen. And she thought: "Oh, will I ever meet that charming person?" And in the meantime Giglio lay very ill in his bed, kept there by the cruel court physician. No one came to see him except the doctor with his hateful medicines that kept him sick and the little maid, Rosalba, who was kind enough to sit by him and read out of a tremendous history in eight volumes without any pictures.

THE TRANSFIGURATION.

A week elapsed between the time of Peter's confession and that of the transfiguration of our Lord. How this time was spent we are not told by the evangelists, but we may be certain that Jesus was either continuing his work of teaching and healing the people, or counseling with the twelve regarding his mission and the way in which he must fulfill it. The shadow of the cross had already fallen upon the souls of the Master and his disciples, and the joy that had but recently thrilled them, when the multitude seemed ready to follow Jesus anywhere, had been succeeded by deepest sorrow, when the fickle crowd turned away and joined the enemies of the Christ. Jesus needed such a token of the Father's approval and love as would nerve him for the dread conflict before him. He saw the weary months of growing hostility on the part of his own people Israel, which would culminate in the agony of the cross. His very purity of soul and divineness of spirit made the thought of such a death more awful. To die as a criminal he who never cherished an evil thought, to be the victim of his people's wrath he who loved them better than he did the bliss of heaven-this it was that made the cup so bitter.

Much more did the disciples need some vision from heaven to reveal to them the true character of him they loved so dearly. Their Messianic ideas were those common to Israel, and they had looked for their Master to declare himself at the proper time and rally the nation to his banner for a war of deliverance from Rome. Instead of this Jesus had told them that he was to die by the hands of his enemies. What did it all mean? They clung to nim still, rather with the blind grasp of unreasoning faith than because they understood him. This faith must be shown to have its foundation in the relation of Jesus to God or they would soon be ready to abandon it. And so a vision was granted to this sorrowing company, one that should strengthen the divine sufferer and sow in the hearts of those who loved him the seeds of an immortal hope.

It was probably evening when Jesus passed up one of the valleys that separate the ridges and peaks of lofty Mount Hermon, whose snowy summit is the glory of the Galilean and Syrian landscape. Reaching a spot where the multitude were not likely to follow him, he left there the body of the disciples and took with him the elect three who were closest in his confidence-Peter, James and John. They ascended one of the spurs of the mountain and reaching its top, stood looking down upon the world that slept unconscious of the presence of its Redeemer. Here, alone with God, breathing the pure air of heaven and canopied by its blue vault, bedecked with stars, the Son of Man spent the night hours in prayer. The three disciples, fatigued by their day's journey, slept. "As he continued praying his soul rose above all earthly sorrows. Drawn forth by the nearness of his Heavenly Father, the divinity within shone through the veiling flesh till his raiment kindled to the dazzling brightness of light, or of the glittering snow on the peaks above him, and his face glowed with a sunlike majesty." Amid such effulgence of glory it was impossible the disciples should sleep. Awaking, they gazed with fear and awe upon the scene and felt for the first time, perhaps, that he whom they had accepted as the Christ was indeed from heaven and not a son of earth. While they gazed, fearing to break the silence, lo, there stood with Jesus, clothed in like manner, with somewhat of unearthly splendor, two majestic forms whom they recognized either by hearing them called by name or through some subtle spiritual sense as Moses and Elijah, the one Israel's great law-giver, the other the first and chief of the nation's prophets.

It was fitting that Moses and Elijah should be the messenger of God to his Son, coming to cheer him in the prospect of death. "When, in the desert he was girding himself for the work of life, angels of life came and ministered to him. Now, in the fair world, when he is girding himself for the work of death, ministrants come to him from the grave-but from the grave conquered-one from that grave under Abarim, which his own hand had sealed long ago; the other from the rest into which he entered without seeing corruption." The theme of their conversation was the decease which Jesus was about to accomplish at Jerusalem-the death he was about to die. "Exodus" is the word Luke uses. Death was merely the "outgoing" of the Lord, as the beginning of his ministry is called by the same evangelist in Acts 13:24 his "incoming." Moses and Elijah could look at death from the heavenly side, and we may be sure that for them all its terror had departed. They could talk of it with the Master as calmly as we could converse about a pleasant journey in which we were to have delightful friends and a diviner Potector. What messages they may have brought to Jesus from the hosts of heaven, who were watching his earthly ministry with increasing wonder and love, we may not know. But his soul was filled with peace and his heart with courage.

To break into such a conversation was too rash an act for even the impetuous Peter to attempt. But no sooner does the interview close and the the visitors from the skies prepare to take their departure than the eager disciple addresses the Master, asking that they be permitted to build booths where the honored servants and Son of God may lodge and 'his blessed converse be prolonged. While he yet was speaking the cloud of glory that had wrapped in its bright folds the form of Jesus spread until it enfolded the disciples, and they fell on their faces in awful dread. A voice out of the cloud, like a thunder on the mountains, spake in words they could never forget: "This is my beloved Son; hear him." Upon the soul of Peter this scene impressed itself so deeply that after a generation had passed he tells the story with such evident feeling as to prove that it was vivid before him: "For we have not followed cunningly devised fables, when we made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but were eyewitnesses of his majesty. For he received from God the Father honor and glory, when there came such a voice to him from the excellent glory, This is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased. And this voice which came from heaven we heard when we were with him in the holy mount."

The disciples hid their faces and lay prone upon the ground. What were they, that they should hear the voice of God and look upon such a vision of the divine glory? They dared not raise their heads till, as Matthew tells us, Jesus himself came and touched them and bade them rise. "They were alone with Jesus, and only the stars rained their quiet luster on the mountain slopes." But from that hour these disciples were assured of some things regarding which the heart of humanity has ever longed to have a sure and steadfast confidence. The righteous dead are living. Whether, like Moses, they pass through the portals of the grave or, like Elijae, they disappear mysteriously from our vision, they are alike with God, who is the God of the living and not of the dead. The righteous dead are happy. They can return on errands of love, if the Father sends them, and brings shining faces and joyful assurances. The righteous dead are immortal. Their bodies are no longer subject to decay and death. The glimpse we here get of the beyond adds emphasis to the words of the Apostle Paul: "Our citizenship is in heaven; from whence also we look for a Savior, the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall fashion anew the body of our humiliation, that it may be conformed to the body of his glory." The "body of his glory" these disciples saw at this time, and it filled them with a rapture that lasted through all the years of their busy and suffering ministry. Finally, they learned that neither law nor prophecy contained God's last and best word for man, but the gospel of the Son of God. "Hear ye him!" is the message which the voice of God would still echo in the ears of every man who places beside the words of Jesus those of any human teacher, or who would go back to the old and outgrown covenant to show man the way of life. The gospel is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth. Let us preach it and live it everywhere till the world is filled with its blessed influence and a transformed race is ready to meet the transfigured Christ upon the white summit of the delectable mountains.

Sunday-School Literature.

THE matter of Sunday-school Literature is one of very great importance. For, whether it should be so or not, the fact is that the character of the instruction given in nine-tenths of the Sunday-school classes throughout the country is determined by the contents of the Lesson Helps they use. This being true, and the fact that first impressions are most lasting, how important that Pastors and Superintendents of Christian Sunday-schools see that their Schools are supplied with Christian Periodicals. If the children are taught that one church is as good as another, that certain divine commands are of little or no importance, or can be changed or set aside by man, what effect will it have on the church of the future? "Think on these things."

We understand a FEW of our schools are using sectarian or union (so called) supplies, in order to save a few cents each quarter. Are you one of that number? Samples of our Supplies sent free.

TOPIC FOR JULY 29.

CUMBERERS OF THE GROUND.

(Luke 13:6-9.)

Rudyard Kipling has a poem about a man-Tomlinson by name-who went up to heaven's gate when he died. St. Peter asked who he was, and the gatekeeper denied him entrance because he had never done anything worth reward, telling him to go back to earth and do something. Tomlinson then went down to hell, and Satan made the same inquiry, and also shut the man out because he had never done anything worth punishment, telling him to go back to earth and do something.

This poem is a good commentary on our lesson. Tomlinson was neither good nor bad. He was merely a cumberer of the ground. It is not enough to be merely neutral, to be not bad. It is necessary to be positively bad; to do things. It is almost better to see a man go plunging into evil, positively, actively, enthusiastically, than to see him merely shilly-shally, doing nothing. Of course it is far better-as far as heaven is above earth-to see him go plunging into good with al the enthusiasm of a noble effort.

When one is a cumberer of the soil there is only one thing possible and that is, with our Lord's parable and Kipling's poem, to give him another chance; to freshen the soil about his roots; to stir him to some sort of earnest activity. Many things can do this.

Sometimes a sin will awake such a one. There are some namby-pamby, weak ones who, ere they are aware, drift into a positive tresspass. Punishment falls upon their heads. Regret and remorse come. The bitterness of the cup of sin is drained. Then they arouse and do better things. A sin is not always a destroying agent. Occasionally, like a a powerful drug, a heroic remedy, which leaves a shattered system behind, it nevertheless brings cure.

Sometimes a sorrow will awaken a sleeping soul. As the plowshare tears through fallow land, so sometimes does pain uproot a fallow life. Our good Father, the great Husbandman, often sends the iron of adversity about the roots of his cumberers to freshen them to activity.

A new and great affection sometimes acts as a stimulus to a positive life. If one's heart is engaged by some noble character that absorbs all one's better elements and dissipates all one's worser tendencies, all the fruitfulness of life may be stimulated and a cumberer may become a bearer. Happy is the life that finds such a great affection. Happy is the life that centres all its heart upon Jesus, the Friend of all. Such a companionship cannot but be helpful.

Some of us, perhaps, are too often inclined to think of ourselves as mere cumberers, when, in reality, we may be quite the contrary. Because we are not doing great startling deeds, because we are not playing a spectacular part in life, because we may not be seen of men or be large in our evident influence, we sometimes depreciate ourselves and feel that we are of no use in the world. This may be a serious mistake. If one only leads a quiet and a happy life, trying to brighten the little circle in which he lives, having as pleasant and joyous and full and round a life as possible in the home and neighborhood, such a one is far from a cumberer. Only let us shine in the little circle where we are, making no dark-ness and not flickering with a vain attempt to be a lighthouse, and we shall fulfill our mission.

The Acme.... Smelting and Refining Company

Offers to Investors for a Short Time Unequaled Advantages.

IT IS A WELL-KNOWN FACT

That a custom smelter, properly equipped and operated, is the most certain source of revenue in the mining business

ITS SUCCESS

Is not contingent upon the output of any one mine or group of mines, but draws its support from a large number of mines in the district where it is located. There are 100 producing and paying mines within a convenient distance of our smelter site and at least 200 more would be developed if there was a custom smelter conveniently located to which ore could be shipped for treatment.

A CUSTOM SMELTER

Bears the same relation to mining that a grist mill does to an agricultural district, with the profits greatly in favor of a custom smelter. The usual net profits of a custom smelter are about $3.00 per ton.

VE HAVE GIVEN YEARS

Of careful study to our plans and know that we are warranted in our undertaking—the erection of a custom smelting plant. Risks which exist in all ordinary mining operations have been carefully eliminated from our plans. We have water, fluxes, an inexhaustible supply of ore and a clear field.

WE CONTRACT NO DEBTS. OUR MOTTO IS: CASH or NOTHING.

A CUSTOM SMELTER HAS THESE ADVANTAGES OVER ALL KINDS OF COMMERCIAL BUSINESS:

- The product of a smelter invariably sells for cash.
- The ore smelted is ample security for the expense of smelting.
- Profits are always large, often reaching 50 per cent. annually on the par value of the stock. 3.
- Charges for smelting are always collected before the "matte" or refined ore is delivered from the 4. smelter.
 - 5. A custom smelter has no bad debts.
 - 6. A gold smelter's out-put never fluctuates in value.
- A gold smelter is absolutely independent of any financial stringency, business stagnation, politica disturbance, or other calamity which jeopardizes all ordinary classes of investments.

MAGAZINES.

The Delineator for August is about as complete in its mission and handsome in its appearance as a magazine can well be. The styles and fashions of the day for the fair sex are displayed in type and in plates, colored and plain, as complete as life itself. But the magazine appeals not alone to the eye, but to the intellect. It has a number of leading magazine articles on interesting topics, written in a popular view, which cannot fail of attraction. The Delineator is published monthlyby the Butterick Publishing Co., New York, at the low price of $1.00 per year.

The Treasury of Religions Thought, published by E. B. Treat&Co., New York, appears each month with a valuable freightage of living religious thought. It is always fresh and vigorous in each of its many departments and ought to be a very popular lousehold magazine as well as preachers' companion. The sermons each month are by leading men in the pulpit and are of value in many ways. The sermon outlines are always suggestive and helpful. Every department, in fact, seems both timely and hopeful, and the perusal of such a magazine cannot be without its good spiritual results.

Vick's Illustrated Monthly continues to hold its place as authority on flowers, fruits and vegetables. To appreciate the value of such a mag azine one has but to attempt to raise flowers, fruits or vegetables in this age of the world without literature. The old hit-or-miss plan is out of date and science has come into play. The amateur at these things will come across things daily that baffle his skill, and but for a magazine or other authority he would fail. As in all other departments of life, a special literature is essential to success, and this any one will find in Vick's Illustrated Monthly, Rochester New York.

The Preacher's Helper, the Rev. G. Holzapfel, A. M., Cleona, Pa., editor and publisher, is a well-named magazine. It is helpful to the preacher by its sermons, its vigorous thought, its suggestions, the experiences of other preachers and its wide variety of literature on church and ministerial work. The sermons, sermon thoughts, suggestions and outlines and other literature are always carefully selected from authoritative sources and always presented in good form. No reader of this magazine is caught behind the times or the issues of the day. It will keep him posted and his mind quickened for any emergency.

The July magazine number of The Outlook contains an interesting collection of pictures relating to the present Chinese crisis, including authentic portraits of the young emperor and of Kang Yu Wei, the famous leader of the Chinese Reform party—portraits obtained from Chinese sources, and it is believed, never before published—an excellent portrait of Mr. Conger, our minister to China, portraits of General Chaffee, the newly appointed American commander in China, Admiral Kempff and Captain McCalla, and also a rare and interesting group portrait of the members of the Chinese Foreign Office, the Tsung-li Yamen $3.00 a year. BONEBRAKE.

Benjamin Franklin Bonebrake was born in Fountain County, Ind., March 22, 1839, and departed this life June 28, 1900. On April 4, 1866, he was united in marriage to Miss Mary M. Lindsey and to this union five children were born, two daughters and one son having preceded him. Bro. Bonebrake united with the Christian Church at State Line, Ind., in 1875, having previously been a member of the United Brethren from his boyhood. He has been a liberal contributor to the church and various missionary boards as well as always found in his pew at every service; but he has passed on higher—passed through the veil that divides the seen from the unseen into the light of another morning—a morning that has no noon, a noon that knows no night.

BOZARTH.

Lindell Bozarth, the son of Bro. and Sister A. C. Bozarth, was born Oct. 2, 1883; died May 25' 1900. His death was a surprise to all of us, and we could hardly realize that it was true. He was a much-loved Christian boy. He was the youngeft of the family and light of the home. During the winter of '97 Bro. Geo. Buckner held a meeting in La Grange and Lindell, and he was the first to make the good confession. He was followed by his entire Sunday-school class and ever since he has been a leader among them in all good works, always in his place on time. He is missed by teachers, pupils and pastor, while the vacancy in the home can never be filled. But the Master had need of him and he was called to a higher work.

CAMPBELL.

The Detroit Church and C. W. B. M. Auxiliary have held recent services, beautiful and tender in spirit, in memory of Mrs. Caroline Linn Campbell, who died Tuesday, May 15. Mrs. Campbell, lovingly known throughout the church as "Mother" Campbell, was a charter member of the church and the auxiliary, the first vice-president of the auxiliary for nearly 20 years and a life member of the C. W. B. M. Long before there was a missionary organization in our church she was a true missionary, home and foreign, longing for our brethren to do their share to redeem the world for Christ. It is one of the remarkable tributes paid to her m mory that few ever came for long under her influence without becoming a Christian. In the charitable organizations of the city she has been among the charter members and most zealous of workers. No church, city or home could claim a more loyal Christian character than Mrs. Campbell has ever been. To have been associated with her is deemed a precious privilege by her friends.

DOWNING.

I was called last week to attend a very sad service. Bro. J. M. Downing's little son, Bruce Glidden, was bitten by a dog more than a month ago. The fond parents feared hydrophobia from the first, but many things tended to quiet their fears. Thirty-one days passed and the wound was nearly healed when the dreaded consequences came. He showed signs of hydrophobia on Sunday evening and passed away Tuesday afternoon. He was conscious nearly to the last. A large concourse of friends gathered at the Hillside Chapel in this city on Wednesday afternoon to mingle their tears of sympathy with those of the griefstricken parents. Bro. and Sister Downing have many friends in Missouri and Kansas.

GLEN.

After an illness of seven weeks William R. Glen passed quietly away to the better land March 10, 1900. He was in his 48th year. For several years he had suffered with a disease of the intercostal nerves. Grippe aggravated this trouble and blood-poisoning developed in one of the lower limbs, which in spite of all that the best medical skill could do carried him swiftly to the end. For many years he was a beloved and hon-ored officer of the First Church in Philadelphia and superintendent of the Sunday-school. he moved to New York, last fall, the church in Philadelphia, as a token of appreciation of his long and valuable services, presented him with a beautiful loving cup and many other expressions of esteem. Coming to New York he came at once with his entire family into our church and entered upon the work with the greatest enthusiasm. was placed upon our board of officers and took charge of our young men's Bible class in the Sunday school. Though permitted to labor with us but a few months, his strong personality and beautiful Christian character will ever remain as a precious legacy. He was for many years associated with the American Book Co., of this city. His business career is a model and inspiration. He had a genius for making friends. Those who came in contact with him in a business way soon passed into the inner circle of warmest friendship. His great, loving heart captivated all who knew him. It was in his home that the beauty of his life and the warmth of his affection shone with greatest lustre. Here he was like a central sun, diffusing a genial atmosphere—a loveliness which could be felt but not described. He leaves a devoted wife and four children, all members of the church. His dust sleeps in the quiet Woodlawn Cemetery, but he has gone to be with God, where one day we shall see his face again.

MELONE.

Bro. W. T. Melone was born in Morgan county, Ill., Nov. 24, 1854. Early in life he became a Christian and his prospects of heaven were bright at the close of his career. His home was at Virginia, Ill., before coming to California, which was 13 years ago. His coming was for his health. Our brother served the church as a deacon for a time. He was always solicitous about her progress. Two weeks before his death he served on a committee to purchase an additional lot for the church. Bro. Melone was a member of the auxiliary and interested in all missionary causes. His health prevented him from attending the Lord's house regularly. When present his talks and prayers were a benediction. Sister Melone, two daughters, Sisters Nettle and Lillian, and three sons, Earl, Burrell and Henry, mourn the loss of a dear and gentle husband and most affectionate father, the church a devout and exemplary member, the community an honored citizen. Bro. Melone's mother, one brother and one sister survive him. The funeral was held at the home near Saratoga, Cal., June 13, 1900, attended by a large gathering of neighbors and sympathizing friends. His remains were laid to rest in Los Gatos Cemetery, covered with flowers. "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord henceforth; they rest from their labors and their works follow with them."

RANSHAW.

Henry Ranshaw was born in London, England, 73 years ago. Died at Covington, Ky., June 30, 1900. Bro. Ranshaw came to this country when 19 years of age. He united with the First Church of this city, in March, 1866. He served as deacon for several years. He was ordained an Church of this city, in March, 1866. He served as deacon for several years. He was ordained an elder in February, 1871, which office he filled continuously and faithfully until his death. He has also for a quarter of a century been assistant superintendent of the Sunday-school and one of the church trustees. He leaves to mourn his loss eight sons and three daughters, all members of this church except one, George B. Ranshaw, who is pastor of the church at San Antonio, Tex. Bro. Ranshaw has ever been a faithful and consistent member and officeholder in the church. Though having a large business he never neglected his duties at the service of God's house. Our church has sustained a great loss, but the memory of his faithful life will ever be to us an inspiration to nobler efforts.

WOOLERY.

On the night of June 25, Prof. L. C. Woolery obeyed the summons, "Come up higher." For about five weeks he had suffered the ravages of inflammatory rheumatism, but was thought to be re covering; so the announcement of his death was a severe shock to his friends who had been with him during his sickness, as it will be to the wider circele of his acquaintances. Prof. Woolery celebrated his 42nd birthday last April. He was born and reared in Pendleton County, Ky. After a preparatory course in Hopedale Normal College, a preparatory course in hopedale Normal College, hopedale Ohio, he entered Bethany College in the fall of 1880. He completed the classical course in '84, receiving the first honors of his class of 24. Four years later he received the degree of A. M. Immediately after graduation he accepted the principalship of Fayette College, Higginaville, Mo. In 1886 he have the trade of the residence of the superior of the s Fayette College, Higginaville, Mo. In 1886 he began the study of law in Falmouth, Ky., and by working 16 hours a day was admitted to the bar the following year. In the fall of '87 Prof. Woolery yielded to the earnest entreaty of his brother, W. H. Woolery, then president of Bethany College, and accepted the chair of Greek in his Alma Mater, with the expectation of returning to the legal profession in one year. But new inducements and new influences were continually brought. ments and new influences were continually brought to bear that resulted in his remaining six years. It was during his professorship here, on the 7th day of August, 1888, that he was united in mar-riage with Miss Mattie V. Paul, of Hopedale, Ohio. It was a rare union, both possessing strong Chris-tian character and high intellectual attainment. In 1893 he removed to Louisville, Ky., to re-sume the practice of law. He was at once ad-mitted to the Louisville bar and was successful in his chosen work, but soon saw that he had lost his enthusiasm for the legal profession. He had taught too long and was too strongly attached to the classroom to transfer his affections back to the profession of his early choice. In the fall of '95 he accepted a call to the chair of Greek in Drake University, and two years later resigned Drake University, and two years later resigned this position to accept the same chair in the State University of West Virginia. Prof. Woolery was not only an educator of inter-state reputation; he was first of all a Christian. The cause of his Master was ever uppermost in his mind. Christian integrity characterized his life work. His impress for good upon all who knew him is his most lasting memorial. No words of eulogy could do justice to his strong Christian character. Soon after his removal to Louisville he was made president of the city C. E. Union and was a power for righteousness among the young people: When he came to Morgantown three years ago, the Discirighteousness among the young people: When he came to Morgantown three years ago, the Disciples of Christ were not represented in the city. Prof. Woolery soon found a few scattered members of the church in town and community and invited them to his home for worship. His devotion and energy, with that of a few others, resulted in the organization of a church and the erection of a commodious house of worship. These are instances of the good work in which he was contin-ually engaged. "His sun has gone down at noonvally engaged. "His sun has gone down at non-day." He had scarcely yet reached the midst of life's activities. To us his death seems indeed premature, but "God moves in a mysterious way, his wonders to perform." The influence of a righteous life is our inheritance, and it will never discharge the state of the state die. A wife and three little daughters remain to mourn the loss of a generous and devoted husband and father. The steadfast hope of a reunion never to be broken is their consolation, for he was faithful unto death. Of the Woolery family there remain two brothers, G. E. and J. D. Woolery, residing with the aged father at Antioch, Mills, Ky., Mrs. Alice Kendrick, of Danville, Ky., Prof. J. F. Woolery, of Omaha, Neb., and Kirby S. Woolery, of Manington, W. Va. The interment

CHANGE OF ROUTE OF

ILLINOIS CENTRAL R. R.

The Illinois Central's Chicago-St. Louis line, over which the Daylight Special and the Diamond Special trains are run, has been changed between Clinton and East St. Louis, the new line now being from Clinton via Springfield and Litchfield instead of via Decatur and Pana as formerly. This is brought about by the recent acquisition by the Illinois Central Railroad Company of a portion of the St. Louis, Peoria & Northern Railway. It gives to the "Central" a first class through line over its own tracks for the entire distance between Chicago and St. Louis, reduces the distance by six miles and brings Springfield, the thriving State Capital of Illinois, on to a through main line. From Chicago to Clinton the line continues to be via Gliman, Gibson and Farmer City. On this line the "Daylight Special" has been newly and elegantly equipped, and has had added to it two new features of radical interest, namely, a

The dining car has a capacity of thirty at a sitting and takes the place of the Compartment-Cafe, and the Pullman-Buffet features previously maintained on this train. It is open for meals (served a la carte) during the entire run between St. Louis and Chicago.

New Local Line Between St. Louis and Freeport

A through coach is now run between St. Louis and Freeport on local trains leaving St. Louis and leaving Freeport, in the morning. This is a first-class line for such points in Northern Illinois as Bloomington, El Paso, La Salle, Mendota, Forreston and Freeport; and, as good connection is made by this through car at Freeport with the Central's through Limited trains to and from the west, it is also a first-class line for Galena, Dubuque and local points west in Iowa. Connection is also made north bound with trains for Munroe, Dodgeville and Madison, Wisconsin.

Lake Maxinkuckee.

Beautiful Maxinkuckee, the Diamond Lake, has no rival. Her crystal waters, picturesque scenery, cool breezes, high bluffs, elevated shoreline, shady groves, rocky bottom and gravelly beach give this gem such a commanding position that no other lake in the state disputes her pre-eminence. On her waters float three steamers, steam launches and over one hundred sail and rowboats. On the shores of the lake are flowing wells, ten hotels, two hundred cottages and, including the town of Culver, about 2,000 people. Thirteen miles in circumference and as smooth as a sea of glass, Maxinkuckee is unsurpassed for boating, fishing and bathing. All these attractions make her the most charming place for rest and pleasure. The most attractive place on the lake is Maxinkuckee Park, on the northwest side of the lake, where Maxinkuckee Assembly Grounds are located. From Observatory Point, on the south end of the park, the finest view of the lake is to be had. This park, containing twenty-six acres, fifteen forest trees and a frontage of 800 feet, is within five minutes' walk of the post office, depot and boat landing. Culver, Ind., the post office, is on the Vandalia Railroad, 100 miles north of Indianapolis, 90 miles southeast of Chicago. 33 miles north of Logansport and 34 miles south of South Bend. Many large trunk lines of railway cross Northern Indiana and are intersected by the Vandalia railroad. The Nickle Plate and the Erie Railroads have stations within two and three miles of the assembly grounds.

As we have before stated, the Maxinkuckee Assembly has arranged a season program that cannot fail to increase the popularity of this summer resort. Among the attractions in the way of popular lectures, addresses and sermons are such men as Hon. S. M. Jones, mayor of Toledo, Ex-Governor Will Cumback, Quincy Lee Morrow, O. W. Stewart, Chas. Eckhart, M. W. Harkins, W. S. Doan, L. T. Van Cleve, Clinton N. Howard, R. H. Randail, J. P. Lichtenberger and numerous others we cannot now mention. The National Evangelistic Congress, Aug. 9, 10, the Prohibition Encampment, July 30, 31, and the Indiana Christian Lectureship, Aug. 6-9 will all be intellectual feasts and refreshing seasens. Alexander Campbell's Works.

No preacher among the Disciples of Christ ought to be without the principal works of Alexander Campbell. In profound thought, in strong expression, in polemic skill, in wholesome rhetoric, in mighty generalizations of transcendent themes he ranks among the literary and religious masters of the world.

I have nearly every page of his writings in my library. I would not think I had a library if his works were not in it. The Christian Publishing Company is doing a good thing in placing so many of his works at so small a cost.

CURRENT EVENTS.

In our last issue we reported the repulse of the allied troops at Tien-Tsin on the 13th of the present month. Notwithstanding this repulse and the heavy loss sustained the attack was renewed on the next day and resulted in the defeat of the Chinese troops or forces and the capture of the city. The Japanese troops were the first to enter the city, but they were soon followed by the troops of the other powers represented. The Chinese are said to have lost over two thousand men, a large number of cannon and arms and a large quantity of amunition. There was also terrible destruction of property. The effect of the defeat of the Chinese forces and the loss of their forts, city and munitions of war is said to have greatly disheartened them in their anti-foreign movement, and that resistance hereafter will be less formidable than at the first. The taking of Tien-Tsin will greatly facilitate the allied troops in their effort to reach Pekin, but it will be some days yet before the movement can be made.

Beyond the fall of Tien-Tsin, on the 14th of July, there is but little improvement, if any, in the Chinese situation. On Friday our government at Washington, through the Chinese Minister, Wu, received a message from our minister, Conger, in Pekin, but the message was far from satisfactory. The authenticity of the message was not wholly discredited, but it was not dated and may not have been a recent dispatch. It seems to have left Pekin on the 18th instant, but the message may have been many days older. Secretary Hay has therefore renewed his effort to get into communication with Conger in Pekin, if alive, and with greater energy. Other powers are pursuing a similar course in relation to their ministers in Pekin. The message had the effect of renewing hope in the possibility of the ministers in Pekin, except the German Minister, being still alive, but the confirmation of this hope is still wanting.

Leading Chinese officials are endeavoring to covince the powers that all the ministers in Pekin except the German Minister are still alive, but very singularly omit the vital point in their assertions or reports, and that is the positive proof of their existence alive in Pekin. In the absence of this proof the powers may well remain suspicious of the reports, especially since it seems possible for those in authority in Pekin to know the truth and to state it to the world in a way that would clear up the mystery. There are indications that this government upon the evidence of sincerity on the part of the government in Pekin and when fully advised of the situation so that it may act intelligently will undertake to use its influence to restore peaceful relations between the Imperial Government of China and the powers with whom it is now practically in a state of war.

The Imperial Government of China has made overtures to France to restore peaceful relations with Russia and other powers with whom she is in trouble, but France declined to so act while the present disturbed and distressing conditions prevail in Pekin and other parts of the empire. Failing in her, effort through France, the Imperial Government next turned to the United States with her plea for peace, and while the United States will not comply with the request as made at present, she took a more considerate attitude toward China in the matter. Evidently the situation is one that calls for the wisest possible consideration and action lest the now brittle thread of unity between the powers be broken. The report that Russia, France and Germany have decided upon a course of their own independent of the other powers is not the most favorable turn of affairs in view of a speedy settlement of the trouble and the restoration of order in China.

Li Hung Chang, the ablest living Chinese statesman, has been appointed Viceroy of Chi-Li by the Emperor or Empress Dowager, of Pekin, China, and is now on his way to the imperial city. He is traveling with a bodyguard of two hundred and eighty men. At Hong-Kong he received quite an ovation, but not so at Shanghai. The Chinese authorities there refused to meet him in their official capacity. He was strongly petitioned to remain in Canton, but claimed that he could not be disobedient to his Imperial Majesty at Pekin. He claims to believe that the ministers at Pekin are still alive except the German Minister and seems anxious if possible to preserve the lives of the foreigners in Pekin and to restore order in the empire. There are indications, however, that some of the powers, in Europe at least, are not as free from suspicion in his movements and designs as it would be their pleasure to

The message received from Minister Conger at Pekin and supposed to have been dated July 18th, reads as follows: "In British legation. Under continued shot and shell from Chinese troops. Quick relief only can prevent general massacre. Conger." Secretary Hay has repeated this cablegram to all our embassadors in other countries, instructing them to urge the respective governments to which they are accredited to co-operate in the immediate relief of Pekin. Secretary Long has also telegraphed Admiral Remey the news from Conger, instructing him to "use and urge every means possible for immediate relief." It is believed by these secretaries that this message is genuine since it comes in cipher dispatch, and is in reply to one sent by Secretary Hay through the Chinese Minister Wu. It is also confirmed by dispatches from Consul Fowler at Cheo Foo. This is indeed good news-better than we ever expected to hear from Pekin. There is reason to hope that if the foreigners have held out thus far against the assaults of the Chinese, they may possibly hold out until a relief column can be sent through to the Chinese capital. Any delay now through national jealousy or redtape or any other cause that is avoidable, would be criminal. The case is one that demands haste. It is so urgent that it would seem to justify what might under other conditions be deemed a reckless adventure. It is certainly not desirable to have the tale of Admiral Seymour's unfortunate retreat repeated, but by this time it would seem that there should be a sufficient force concentrated at Taku and Tien-Tsin to organize a relief column that could cut its way through hostile Boxers to the beleaguered foreigners in Pekin. We are sure from the action already taken that our government is fully awake to the need of urgency and that it will be no fault of ours if such an expedition is not organized and put on the march at once.

There are ominous signs of the spread of the Boxers' rebellion throughout China. It is feared by many that the visit of Li Hung Chang to Pekin bodes no good for the welfare of the foreigners in China. It is not believed for a moment that he will antagonize the Empress Dowager who, it is evident, have given aid and sympathy to the Boxers. It is possible that the wily Empress may wish to use Prince Li to make some sort of terms with the powers, seeing that Prince Tuan's rebellion is not likely to succeed. But any compromise or settlement that leaves the Empress Dowager in authority would be most unfortunate for the welfare of civilization. The time has come when China must be put under enlightened and civilized rule. It is one thing for our government to insist on maintaining the integrity of the Chinese Empire and quite another for her to lend her influence toward a continuation of the present regime. The former is in every way desirable; the latter, as it seems to us, is wholly out of the question. The invasion of Russian territory by the Chinese is a matter that is looked upon as having great importance because it may lead to serious international complications. If Russia has declared war against China on her lown account without consulting the others powers, as it is rumored she has done, this action of hers would lead to serious consequences. It is not probable, however, that Russia would igaore the other powers and assume the responsibility of settling the world's debt with China. There is much mystery yet to be cleared up concerning the whole situation in China, but the mystery will be cleared up and China will be brought to a realizing sense of her responsibility to civilization before there is an end of the present conflict. National jealousies may delay, but they can hardly prevent the administration of a just punishment upon those in authority in China who shall be found responsible for the crimes which have been committed against humanity and against the laws of enlightened nations.

"ALEXANDER CAMPBELL'S THEOLOGY,"*

There comes a time in the history of every religious movement that takes a permanent hold on the life of the world and becomes a factor among the forces that are shaping the thought of men, when there is an awakened interest, not only in the beginnings of the movement, but in those historical conditions out of which the movement sprang. Hitherto we have been far more concerned in making history than in writing it. Our attention has been directed. not so much to the antecedent conditions out of which our restoration movement came, as to the conditions on which its successful ongoing depends. We have reached that period in our history, however, when there is evidently a much keener interest in those historical studies which help us to understand why the movement came into being and the forces which have made it what it is.

The volume whose title is given above is an attempt to study and state the religious and philosophical conditions of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, in their relation to the restoration movement of the nineteenth century, according to the historical method. Every movement possessing the vitality and the power to achieve results manifested by the reformation inaugurated by the Campbells has roots that reach far back into history. It is exceedingly profitable and interesting to trace these roots in order to learn what were the influences which shaped and which made necessary such movement. This is the aim of the book referred to, and it seems to us a most suggestive and profitable contribution to that investigation which is sure to be carried on by the scholars of the future.

The Introduction is an explanation and vindication of the historical method. Then follows, in another chapter, "The Development of the Problem of Unity." This development was going on during the three centuries of Protestantism preceding the nineteenth. The problem of unity was not a new one. "Some of the most influential men in England and on the Continent had consulted and planned for the restoration of urity among Christians-between Catholics and Protestants, between Lutherans and Reformed, between Anglicans and Dissenters, between Presbyterians and Independents. But none of these attempts made more than the faintest and most fleeting impression on the religious world." . . . "At the beginning of the nineteenth century a young man, without reputation, living in a remote district, far from the centers of the world's thought, made an attempt, in many respects not unlike those which had preceded, to bring about the union of Christians. The result was, not a spasmodic effort followed by relapse, but the beginning of an important religious movement, which has had for its chief mission the advocacy of Christian union." . . . "The explanation of this phenomenon can be found only in the fact that the problem of unity was not fully developed and ready for solution until about the time of Mr. Campbell's attempt."

In other words, the fullness of time had not yet come when the movement for union could be born with the hope of success. "The most important problem which confronted the religious world at the beginning of the nineteenth century was this: "How is it possible to reconcile the individual's liberty of conscience and intellect with that degree of unity of the church in spirit and organization which is demanded by the will of Christ and by the practical requirement for efficiency in His service?" The author then discusses how the principle of solidarity under Romanism, and how the principle of individualism under Protestantism, had each been worked out, with the tyranny of the one and the religious anarchy of the other, until the problem of unity thrust itself upon the minds of all thoughtful people.

Summing up the r suits of the three centuries preceding the nineteenth, "the whole history of Protestantism had been a continual demonstration of the impossibility of uniting on the basis of a complete theology even a professedly biblical theology. The exercise of the right of private judgment is a guarantee that there will always be many differences of opinion as to what the Bible teaches upon certain points of doctrine." The attempt to reduce Christianity to its essential elements by reliance upon feeling on the one hand and upon reason on the other both failed. "The significance of Alexander Campbell's contribution to the question of Christian union is that he took the matter up just at this point and proposed another principle of union. The unity of the church is to he based, not upon a complete system of biblical or dogmatic theology, nor upon anything which is to be found within the individual himself, but upon the authority of Christ and the terms which He has laid down as the conditions of salvation." While Protestantism has affirmed that "the Bible and the Bible alone is the religion of Protestants," it was "rather Mr. Campbell's idea that the Bible is to be taken as the authority for determining what is essential in Christianity." . . . The question to be answered is: "What did the apostles, taught by Christ, consider the essentials of the church?" The result of Mr. Campbell's effort to answer this question was that Christ Himself was the object of faith, and obedience to His commands is the necessary expression of that faith, and that the two, faith and obedience, are the conditions of salvation, and therefore the basis of Christian fellowship.

In our judgment the greatest contribution of Alexander Campbell to the work of Christian union was his seizing the central and fundamental truth of Christianity, namely, the Messiahship and divinity of Christ, as the sufficient confession of faiththe foundation on which the church was built. Considering the time when Mr. Campbell reached this conclusion, and put it into practical operation by requiring candidates for baptism to make only this confessiona time when creed-subscription was supposed to be essential to orthodoxy-it impresses us as one of the sublimest conceptions in ecclesiastical history, and one of the most important steps looking to the solution of the problem of unity. It was revolutionary in its effects, so far as denominationalism was concerned, and presenting as it did an entirely new center of union and co-operation. This became the formative and determinative principle in the plea urged by Mr. Campbell and those who have succeeded him for Christian union.

It is impossible in this article to deal with the succeeding chapters on "The Philosophical Basis," in which there is a review of the philosophical systems of the time, of Mr. Campbell's "Theological Heritage," of his views on "The Kingdom of God," on "Authority and Inspiration," on "Faith and Repentance," on "Baptism," on "The Work of the Holy Spirit," and on "The Idea of God." Every one of these chapters will be read with the deepest interest by all students of our movement and all who would become acquainted with the religious ideas of one of the world's greatest reformers. Of special interest just now is the chapter entitled ".he Work of the Holy Spirit in Conversion and Regeneration." The development of Mr. Campbell's thought on this subject is set forth in this chapter in the light of his debates and his later works. The influence of Locke's Philosophy on Mr. Campbell's thinking is well brought out in this and other chapters, as well as his independence of that philosophy when it proved inadequate to meet the demands of religious experience.

It is explained in a prefatory note that "the studies, the results of which are embodied in this volume, were begun in the preparation of a thesis for a degree from the University of Chicago in 1897, under the title 'The Sources of Alexander Campbell's Theology,' and that they have been continued, and are now published, in the hope that those who are interested, or may become interested in the subject, may derive from them some aid in interpreting Mr. Campbell's work as a the logian in the light of its historical setting." It is only intended, then, as a modest contribution to a subject which would require more than a volume, and more wisdom than the author claims, to exhaust it. The volume is timely, and will doubtless tend to intensify interest in the historical study of a religious movement which has as yet the dew of its youth, with the promise of tremendous expansion and power in the years to come.

A SCRIPTURE STUDY.

(Act. 8:1-12.)

[Uniform Midweek Prayer-meeting Topic August 1.]
CENTRAL TRUTH: The gospel ever meets with persecution because it antagonizes pagan idolatry and outgrown systems of worship and demands truth and righteousness; but whether by peaceful methods or through persecution it must be spread abroad among all nations.

It was a stormy period in the history of the infant church. Stephen, the devout, talented, heoric young preacher of the new faith had just suffered martyrdom. Saul was laying waste the church, by desolating persecution. The thousands of new converts had been driven away from the city of Jerusalem and only the apostles were left to represent the church in the capital and stronghold of Judaism. No doubt there were enemies of the church and perhaps faint-hearted believers who said that the church had proved a failure and that its members had been scattered like chaff before the wind.

That was a great mistake. It was not like chaff scattered before the winds, but like seeds borne on the wings of the wind to find [lodgment in fertile soil and to spring up again and bear fruit, "some thirty, some sixty and some an hundredfold.' It often happens that the very means adopted by the enemies of the church to destroy it have turned out to be the means of spreading its influence and deepening its hold in the world. It was in this case, for the disciples who were scattered abroad "went everywhere preaching the Word." They rehearsed in their simple and earnest way the great facts which had transpired at Jerusalem and all they had seen and heard about Jesus of Nazareth and the salvation which he offered to men.

It is altogether probable that without this persecution the church at Jerusalem might have settled down and taken things easy, thinking that it would be sufficient to convert the Jews when they came to Jerusalem. It is evident that it had not yet grasped the full meaning of the great commission. It required something like this persecution on the part of the Jews to drive the young church out among the Gentiles where its new truths and revolutionary ideas of religion would find more congenial soil.

"God moves in a mysterious way His wonders to perform." He will have his truth spread abroad among men and when other means fail He makes even His enemies instruments for disseminating it.

The passage ited above for our study gives an account of one of those who were scattered abroad. Philip "went down to the city of Samaria and proclaimed unto them the Christ." This was the same Christ who, during His earthly ministry, going from Judea to Galilee, passed through Samaria instead of going around it as His countrymen are accustomed to do. Did this fact, and the days He spent teaching in the city of Sychar, have anything to do in preparing the people to receive the Word which Philip preached? However that may be we read that "the multitudes gave heed with one accord unto the things that were spoken by Philip when they heard and saw the signs which he did." What a welcome contrast this afforded with the way in which the people in Jerusalem had treated the gospel message! These Jews in the capital city had heard the apostles themselves, many of them knew Jesus personally, had witnessed His miracles and had heard His teachings, and yet they rejected Him. These Samaritans, with very few of the advantages and opportunities of the Jews in Jerusalem, were prompt to believe the preaching of Philip and to yield themselves as willing subjects to the reign of Christ.

This fact furnishes a sufficient answer to that objection to Foreign Missions which demands that the gospel should not be sent abroad until all the people at home have accepted it. The people at home in this case had rejected the gospel, while the people abroad whom the Jews despised and with whom in the old days they would have no dealings, welcomed the gospel message and gave prompt heed to its demands. How many willing souls there are in pagan lands to-day who would gladly welcome the good tidings concerning the gracious Christ and His mission to earth if only it was lovingly proclaimed to them!

Not only did Philip carry the gospel to these Samaritans, but they were relieved of unclean spirits and the lame and the palsied were healed. The result of this cure of both spiritual and bodily disease is thus stated: "And there was much joy in that city." Here is a precedent for medical missions. Our missionaries do not have miraculous power to heal disease, but many of them do possess medical training which enables them to accomplish the same purpose in healing the diseases of the people, and this they are doing in connection with the preaching of the gospel, and it has proved to be, as it was in the case of Philip, an auxiliary in the furtherance of the gospel.

Philip met with one of those superstitions which missionaries always meet with in heathen lands. Simon the sorcerer had been deluding the people in making them believe that he was the great power of God. But when his followers left him, believing Philip, who preached "good tidings concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ" and "were baptized, both men and women," Simon himself also believed and was baptized. The fact that he did not prove faithful in no way detracts from the power of the gospel which had created such a wave of influence that even he was swept into the current. Christianity has the power to cleanse itself from every one who will not be assimilated by its influence to the divine requirements.

The lesson we are to learn from a study of the foregoing passage is that no amount of persecution can stay the progress of the kingdom of God; that even persecution itself becomes a help in spreading the gospel. We learn also that it is the duty of every believer to preach the Word according to the measure of his ability. As to foreign work, we must "go or send." As for the home work, we must both go and send, doing what we can ourselves and helping to send others.

We learn furthermore that the gospel is revolutionary and has no compromises to make with idolatry of any kind, or with any form of unrighteousness. The present seething and turbulent condition of China is but the working out of seed-truths which have been planted in that soil. It is a conflict between Christ and Confucius. The kingdoms of this world must become the kingdom of our Lord and of Christ.

A question for each Disciple to ask himself is: "Am I a seed of the kingdom to spread it abroad, or only chaff?" 4"And the good seed, these are the sons of the kingdom" (Matt. 23:38).

PRAYER.

We thank thee, O Father, for the kingdom Thou hast established on the earth, and for the zeal of the early disciples of Jesus in spreading it abroad among men. We rejoice that Thou hast laid upon "the sons of the kingdom" the responsibility of extending a knowledge of it throughout the earth. We pray that we may be quick to appreciate our duty and privilege in thus co-operating with Thee and with Thy Son, Jesus Christ, and with the Holy Spirit in extending Thy reign over all the children of men. Watch over Thy work and Thy workers in poor, disturbed China, and deliver them speedily from the hands of violence and from the reign of lawlessness, and overrule all these heart-rending scenes for the overthrow of idolatry and the triumph of righteousness in the earth, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen!

New York City is staggering at no obstacles to maintain her commercial predominence in the United States, and if possible to become the metropolis of the world. When the great bridge connecting Brooklyn and New York was completed it was thought to be a marvelous achievement; and it was. But of late years schemes are projected for the city of so much greater magnitude that her great suspension bridge and elevated railways seem only as toys in comparison. A bridge is now being constructed over East River that will far surpass the Brooklyn bridge as an engineering feat, while another bridge over the Hudson is proposed that will eclipse both the Brooklyn and the new East River bridges. In the July number of Ainslie's Magazine is a leading article on the "Transformation of New York," in which an interesting account of these two new bridges which are destined to become vital factors in the future of that great city is given. According to this article the Hudson River bridge when completed is to cost with terminals $60,000,000 and is to surpass anything of the kind in the world. The piers will stand 587 feet above water and the main span of the bridge between piers is to be 3,254 feet. The bridge is to be used exclusively for railroads which now have their terminus upon the New Jersey side of the Hudson River. On the New York side, somewhere near 51st St., is to be built an immense terminal station. With these three great bridges, the tunnel under the Hudson and its subway rapid transit, great water system, parks and commerce, New York is destined to become one of the greatest of the world's great cities.

Editor's Easy Chair Or MACATAWA MUSINGS.

The Easy Chair has found the inspiration for its musings in a great variety of scenes and situations. It is a peripatetic institution, accompanying the editor whithersoever he goeth, and photographing for the mental eye of its readers whatsoever it sees. Today it is on the quarterdeck of a Lake Michigan steamer, with no land visible in any direction. To all appearances we might be in midocean. On every side water, wide-stretching and undulating, for a fine breeze blows from the northeast. Sitting where we can see the water tossed up by the prow of the vessel as the steamer plows its way through the deep, and watching the sunlight whiten the crest of the waves, we are impressed with the wealth of water and with its beauty. How clear and pure it looks as it reflects the colors of the rainbow, rushing out from the path of the vessel and rising above the common level of liquidity! How strong it is, too, lifting the vessel lightly as if it were a toy paper ship. No scenery is quite complete without some water in it. True, the Apostle John, while a captive on Patmos, imprisoned by the sea which separated him from all he loved on earth, spoke of a time when "there shall be no more sea," but he pictured a "pure river of water of life" as flowing through the restored Eden of a redeemed earth.

We have before spoken in these musings about the mystery that attaches to the ocean or a great inland unsalted sea like Lake Michigan. As we have been sitting here gazing over the railing down into the dark-green waters we have been wondering what we should see if our eyes were powerful enough to penetrate to the bottom. Would it be a smooth, sandy floor or a diversified plain with hollows and elevations? Perhaps the latter, as in the ocean beds. "The paths of the sea" probably refers to these submarine caverns or val-

What should we see in the way of fishes, great and small? What a magnificent aquarium it would be if we were equipped with a vision that could watch the movements of the monsters of the deep, which undoubtedly live and move and have their habitation within these waters! The sturgeon, the trout, the whitefish, the masterful muskalunge, to say nothing of the omnipresent perch-how they must swarm down beneath the surface, undisturbed by the keels of passing vessels and beyond the danger of the angler's art! But we saw a moment ago a small dead fish floating on the surface. So there are tragedies here in midlake as well as nearer shore. Wherever life is on earth, there also is death,

When our vessel started out from port this moraing there were two others starting at the same time. They moved out into the lake along the same narrow stream, but no sooner had they reached the great lake then their paths began to diverge. Ours is the center vessel, and now the others appear as specks on the horizon, one on our starboard side, the other on our larboard. The reason of this divergence is plain. The vessels are all aiming for different portsone for South Haven, one for Grand Haven and ours for Macatawa and Holland; "which things are an allegory." There are human souls that enter life about the same time and place, and in boyhood they move along the same course. Very soon, however, as they enter upon real life their paths begin to diverge. They have different ideals and aim at different goals. One seeks a life of ease, self-indulgence and pleasure; another strives for wealth and position, and is ambitious to be great, as men count greatness; another still aims to build a character after the divine Pattern. Feeling the surge of life's great sea about him he cries: "Jesus, Savior, pilot me!" course, these persons move in different courses. They are aiming at very different goals and will be sure to land at different ports. Whither sailest thou, reader?

Thus far had we written on a comparatively smooth sea and in the sunshine. Suddenly there was a change. Dark clouds rolled up from the north and east and a strong "nor'easter" set in. Soon the billows were rolling high and our vessel, "City of Holland," was rolling in a way to send people to bed who had staterooms and others to seek the most comfortable places. Fiercer blew the gale, higher rolled the waves and more and more the vessel pitched and rolled in the grip of the tempest. At first the passengers and crew treated the matter sportively, laughing at those who rushed to the railing to make their offering to the Son of Saturn, who with his trident rules the waters. Later on it became no laughing matter. Men's faces grew solemn. The officers wore an anxious look. "A regular November gale," said the steward, as he gazed out upon the howling waste and felt the shudder of the ship as her propeller left the water and revolved in the air, Land was sighted at 5 P. M., but it was soon found that we were 15 miles south of our port, having been driven that much out of our course by the force of wind and wave. Now the vessel turns northward, and laboring hard makes slow progress against the fury of the gale, while she reels like a drunken man, as do also the few passengers who are now able to be on their feet. The floor of the cabin is covered with pale-faced women, who in mute agony await the end of the voyage. or whatever end may be in store for them. Nearer the harbor light at Macatawa appeared as it sent out its kindly beams across the troubled waters. Now we are opposite the channel. The bell rings and with a lurch the vessel swings to the right and soon passes between the long piers, crowded with people who vociferously cheer our safe arrival. A few minutes later and the good ship stands at Macatawa dock, a long procession of haggard, empty, weary passengers passed out of the vessel and through an opening made for them among the crowds of people who had gathered there to welcome them.

Needless to say these last paragraphs are written on shore. Our Easy Chair had become a rocking chair under conditions not favorable to musings. We had never experienced such a voyage on Lake Michigan before. We prize it, but do not wish for another like it. We spoke of a few who were able to be on their feet and cheer the others by their calmness, courage and good humor. Among these were Burris A. Jenkins, now of Buffalo, N. Y., and "Tom" Ridge, of Kansas City, Mo. We could wish for no better traveling companions than they are, and it would be hard to find better sailors. Some one has said it is hard to maintain one's dignity in seasickness. We saw that illustrated on this voyage. But neither of the men named had occasion to sacrifice their dignity in that way, nor did the writer, though he had to hold the heads of two passengers while they paid their tribute to Neptune. One man who boasted loudly, in the beginning, of his freedom from mal de mer, was one of the first to succumb to it. To-day, as we write these lines, the lake is all smiles and dimples, looking as innocent as if it had never tossed a vessel about on its stormy bosom and made thousands of people feel miserable by its wild frolics. All honor to the faithful captain who guided us safe to harbor, and to the engineer who stood by his engine, watching the steam gauge, oiling the machinery and keeping it in perfect order for its difficult task. Thanksgiving to Him who rules the winds and the waves, and who brought us safely to our desired haven.

OUR COLLEGE-V. The Solution of a Vital Question.

N. J. AYLSWORTH.

We have seen how dangerous it is to send our young people to godless schools to pass through the most critical period of their spiritual history, and we have seen that our colleges provide admirably against this danger and furnish adequate conditions for the establishment of the manly Christian character; so if the parent is disposed to give the matter of his child's spiritual welfare any weight in the consideration, he can have but one choice. But are we absolutely correct in this? Is the parent really shut up to any such alternative? Is the real choice necessarily between a godless school and one of our own colleges?

We are one of the youngest of the religious peoples of this country. There are a great many denominational schools, established in the interest of our common Christianity, and amply endowed and equipped. Why not patronize these, and reach by a shorter route all the advantages of a Christian college? In the first place, many of these, especially the most popular and best endowed, fail to exert any very marked religious influence over the most of their pupils. The Bible forms no part of the general curriculum, and while the management is in sympathy with religious ends, the training is for the most part spiritually colorless. In the student body not a little skepticism is often present and active for harm, and under its influence the Christian youth may easily lose his faith. We know this 'to be often the case. The denominational school has not solved the question of characterreconstruction, that presses at this point; and while it is better than the godless school, facts compel us to decide that it is not sufficiently sate. Christian influences are not put in such relation to the student as to be most effective, and he may easily slip away

But there is another reason why we cannot find in the denominational school the response to our need. While it adheres to our common Christianity, it antagonizes our special plea. Is this plea worth anything? If I know myself, I am not sectarian in spirit, and denominational selfishness is repulsive to me; but if we are to turn the education of our youth, who are to be the leaders of our thought, over to other peoples, we should go much further. If we are to lose our distinctiveness, the best thing for us to do is to die, and as quickly as possible. If we have no mission, our very plea Christian union would demand that we get out of the way as a separate organization as soon as possible, and every hour we remain in existence we give the lie to that plea. But if we have a reason for existence and have great truths to urge upon the acceptance of the world, we shall but commit suicide by putting our children to school to those who antagonize them. The Catholic Church would ask nothing better than to have the education of our youth for a single generation; she would capture this country. College education is to become far more common in the near future than it is now, and if we give our youth to others to educate we shall ere long be a people without a mission. This is not simply a possibility; it is a certainty, and he who cares to watch the operation of causes will not be long in discovering that this conclusion is not merely theoretic. The college is the key to the future. What will become of this key? We should not let other peoples pass us in Christian comity, but we can not give them our children. Here is an open artery through which we may bleed to death.

Is it true, however, that we are compelled to chose between the godless school, our own college, and the denominational schoool? Have we not already solved this entire question in another way? Will not Bible chairs established at the great seats of learning in this country meet every requirement? This is the most crucial question in our educational history. This movement, by our C. W. B. M., is at once one of the happiest and most dangerous steps we have ever taken. There can be no doubt that this thing ought to have been done; there can be as little doubt that, if not well understood, it bodes evil to our colleges. If we are to be a missionary people we cannot forget the educated man, and least of all at the hour when he is at the parting of the ways. The flower of the nation, the leaders of its thought, the shapers of its destiny, are in these great universities, and they are drinking at the fountain of agnosticism. The gospel command to "go and disciple all pations" requires that we go, not alone to the dark-skinned savage, but also to the man who shall rule the world. The last vision of Christ by mortal eyes was when he appeared to convert an educated man; and that man did more for the establishment of Christianity than all the other apostles. It was his thought that fed the fires of the great Reformation, and he has been the father of Protestantism. The one educated apostle has beeen the master of ages. That last miraculous visitation of Christ and this marvelous fact of the masterhood of this man threading the history of nineteen centuries are our warrant for missions to the educated; and as we have not miraculous power we can strike them best before they become our foes, and save them best before they are lost. Woe to us if we work not at these fountains, and sweeten the world's life where best we may! Sanitation is the triumph of medicine. Spiritual sanitation at the fountains of life is the wisest word of our century. The Sunday-school has discovered the child; our Christian women have discovered the college boy. God bless them! it was a Christly inspiration. The heavenly vision to the man of Tarsus shall be their credential for flashing the light of the Redeemer into all college halls.

But first and last our sisters have meant this to be a missionary move. They have never intended that it should supplant our colleges, and would bitterly deplore such a result. If it were possible for us always to control the forces that we call into being this movement could never do our colleges any harm. But when a force once takes its place among the world's agencies its destiny is determined, not by what it was designed to be, but what it is fitted to be, Many a statesman has launched forces whose ultimate working has appalled him. The steed, once harnessed, may run away with us. Our sisters have built a fire by these cold intellectual centres to save the dving; have they not done more? Have they not made our colleges unnecessary? The equipment of these great institutions for intellectual culture is unsurpassed, and at present unapproachable by us. If we have completely solved the religious problem of education by means of the Bible chair there can be no longer any reason beyond that of convenience or expense why we should patronize our colleges, or even seek to perpetuate their existence. It is best that we look this question squarely in the face. Whether these Bible chairs have affected in any appreciable degree the attendance at our colleges I cannot say. Probably not. Probably the matter of propinguity would in any event turn a considerable portion of patronage to them. But if the religious question shall ever have much weight in determining choice, and if our people come to feel that this question has been fully solved by the Bible chair, it will to that extent weaken our colleges.

But there is another danger from which much more is to be apprehended just at present. Our colleges are not endowed; and they must be very soon if they are to continue to exist. If it is felt that the Bible chair completely fulfills the religious purpose of these colleges our people will not put millions of dollars into them to reach an end which can be attained at small expense by carrying the religious feature of our colleges into the great universities. This is why we must face the question squarely now. If we do not see it our business men will, and they will think twice before bestowing their thousands. If we have no answer to this question our colleges are doomed, or they must sink to the level of academies with local patronage. What have we to say? The answer that the writer has generally heard is that these Bible chairs were not intended to supplant our colleges. But this is not the practical question. The question that the practical business man is going to ask is, can they be made to do so? On the answer to this the destiny of our colleges hangs. At the great universities we can have the benfit of the finest classical and scientific equipments in the land without spending a dollar for endowment; and with a small sum we can establish and endow Bible chairs. Whither are we drifting? If our colleges are lost, let us know it now. If they are not, they will suffer until the question is cleard up.

To say the truth on this subject is to sail between Scylla and Charybdis. The work of our colleges and that of our Bible chairs is largely the same, and to speak of one as insufficient in pleading the necessity of the other is to weaken it in popular estimation. But the truth should be spoken clearly and now. Does the Bible chair accomplish all that our colleges do in a religious point of view? No. Why? Because the Bible chair does not make the university a warm spiritual house, but is a fire outside of the building. Students may go to the fire and warm if they will, and many do, and what is accomplished is sufficient to make the undertaking a splendid missionary enterprise, but the great house remains cold and the multitude of its students are not warm. Spiriturl death is not generally painful, but resuscitation has its pangs, and men do not seek it. The Bible chair does not transform these great frozen regions into a summerland where men must be warm. The Bible chair is a fire, not a climate. Your child of sixteen or eighteen is going to pass through a dangerous crisisthe birth of the intellect. He should dwell in a warm house. He should have home and motherhood. Youth is adventurous. Your boy will dare, he will not be wise. Youth is not wise. He will do perilous things at this new awakening; the precipice must not be near. The wine of unbelief must not be before him; companions must not press it to his lips, or he may drink and die. He is impatient of restraint. A girl about "mother's apron-strings" or "Sundayschool sissy" may weigh more with him than all the wisdom of the ages. His father seems fogyish, religion seems tame, there is barbarism in his blood. He is the crabbed, green fruit of manhood. He gravitates to danger; he despises the past and feels omnipotent for the future. Thank God for all this, for it is prophecy; but it is danger. You must put this young wild-man where he will not hurt himself, nor spoil his future. He must not go into influences that save a few for Christ, but such as fold all in his arms. The one thing that the Bible chair does not provide is shelter. It gets as near as possible to the student body of the great university, but it does not inclose it. The voice of the Bible instructor is but one among many which speak a different message. One clear, resonant voice in a Babel of clamor is worth much; but it is only in the sheltering silence of our audience room that its deepest thunder, its varied [modulation, its tender pathos and its feeling whisper are at their best. Our colleges give this silence, and a voice for God. They give what can nowhere else be had. They kindle enthusiasms which can never die; they crown with sublime manbood, which is nearest brother to genius. While we paint the image of the Master on the canvas of the soul our work is not marred by a hundred other hands painting it into Satan. We need the common sense of all arts in this sublimest of arts, the fashioning of the soul; but it is only here that we blunder.

When the great danger period is passed, and the youth has become intellectual without becoming irreligious, he may go to these great universities for postgraduate work if he desires more than a good college course can provide; but we must have him in our colege till then if we would not feed the dragon of infidelity with the flesh of our children.

Much the same may be said of our Bible chairs located at great denominational universities. They are most valuable means of propagating our teaching among other peoples and aiding postgraduate study, but they form but one voice in many; and the dominant influence is likely to be that of the people under whose auspices the university is conducted. This is not the best place to instruct the understanding and fire the heart of our young people with the great truths which constitute our mission as a people. In the mass of other matters and the confusion of tongues this work cannot be best done at such places.

Am I reminded that my position is narrow, and that we should encourage freedom of investigation, and let our young people see all sides? Well, but who is meant for this? Not the fledgling, who has not learned to think, and has not yet learned the truth. Truth must strike deep root ere he may hear the babel of other tongues, or he will be confused; and confusion in belief is skepticism. The roadway ceaselessly traveled by the public grows no grass. The fenced garden visited only by the careful foot of the gardner alone produces fruit. Provincialism of thought is not the danger that threatens the educated man in this day of the ubiquity of the press. The great difficulty is to fence off any mental garden at all. The thunder of the age invades all silence; its publicities all privacies. The cosmopolitan has no country; the cosmopolitan thinker is in danger of having no convictions. Much of the skepticism of the day is not from lack of evidence, but from bewilderment before mountain masses of knowledge. Christ prayed that his people might be one that the world might believe on him. Shall our child, at that period when his faith shall tremble in the balances, be where he shall feel the shock of the divisions of Christendom and be made to stagger before that sad and sinful fact that has caused many to ask in despair, Where is truth? The divisions of Christendom constitute one of the mighty infidelizing influences of the age. While at these great denominational schools the prevailing influence may be distinctly religious, the prestige of a great school and of great scholars offsetting our plea will tend to weaken the estimate of its importance or operate by way of cancelation to destroy confidence in it. When great names, in whom we have confidence disagree, the tendency is to doubt both sides. Then, the student at this period is closely occupied with his college tasks and does little definite thinking beyond them. The prestige of great names and the atmosphere about him will do most toward forming his convictions. "He is not now in a position to weigh and consider, but rather to be molded by the chance influences of his surroundings. our plea be the truth and of great value to the world it is best that at this formative stage the youth shall be under the sheltering influence of one of our own colleges. Later, when his judgment is mature and he has learned well what we believe to be true he may consider other views intelligently and with less danger of that special skepticism which doubts all but our common Christianity.

The Bible chair is for us a great mi sionary enterprise; it is a means of making known our plea to good advantage at the great educational centers; it is a powerful incentive to our people to do postgraduate work and an aid in prosecuting that work along religious lines; but it cannot take the place of our colleges and if it should jostle them out of favor it would do great harm. We must educate our youth or we are lost; and our colleges must do it.

THE SPIRITUAL SIDE OF OUR PLEA.

The Word and the Spirit.

A. B. JONES.

Words are signs of ideas—symbols of thought. Language, oral or written, is a medium through which one intelligent being holds communion with another. Spirit is conscious, intelligent personality. The Bible contains the ideas, thoughts and will of God conveyed in written characters to man. The Holy Spirit inspired prophets, apostles and evangelists to thus communicate the divine will to human understanding. "No prophecy ever came by the will of man; but men spake from God, being moved by the Holy Spirit" (2 Peter 1:21).

"God, having of old time spoken unto the fathers in the prophets by divers portions and in divers manners, hath at the end of these days spoken unto us in his Son" (Heb. 1:1).

"Which things also we speak, not in words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Spirit teacheth; combining spiritual things with spiritual words" (1 Cor. 2:13).

We have here, then, the clear and important distinction between the "things" of the Spirit and the Holy Spirit himself.

The Savior says: "The words which I speak unto you are spirit and are lite" (John 6:63). But this is metaphorical language. Words are not spirit, nor are words life. As signs of ideas they have an influence on spirit and they have an effect on life. One spirit through the medium of language can arouse another spirit to feeling, and move another life to action. And the degree of this influence depends on the nature of the subject treated, and the force with which it is presented to the receiving mind. Christ "spoke as one having authority." "No man ever spake like this man." His themes of life and immortality, of duty and destiny, of time and eternity being of transcendent importance, and he being master of his themes, no wonder that he should say: "The words which I speak unto you are spirit and life"-they are potent. And yet the great Teacher never committed his lessons to writing. He left no record of his words. He was a peripatetic, a teacher by the wayside. The task of formulating and recording his lessons of wisdom was left to his successor, the Holy And this brings us back to our theme—
"The Word and the Spirit." The word is a thing, the Spirit is a person. The word is material; the Spirit is immaterial. The word is the sign of ideas, the Spirit is the author of them. The word symbolizes thought, the Spirit thinks. The word expresses feeling, the Spirit feels. The word reveals, the Spirit is the revelator. The word is the passive means, the Spirit is the active agent.

The distinction, then, between the word and the Spirit is, from every point of view, radical and vital. The Holy Spirit is a divine personality. The ineffable glory of the Godhead manifesting itself as Father, Son and Holy Spirit transcends our powers of comprehension, but not our powers of faith. We can apprehend and believe the sublime truth that the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit are the "one God," and yet officially operating and manifesting himself differently in the creation, the redemption and the glorification of man. We can apprehend what we cannot comprehend, and believe what we cannot understand.

Religion, in its higher forms of thought and experience, eludes the grasp of the logical vise. Syllogisms are not to be formed and applied to matters that lie wholly in the sphere of faith. In mute reverence but implicit confidence we accept some things that we can neither measure nor weigh, neither analyze nor classify. The beauty and sweetness of childhood are seen in its unfaltering trust in its mother in all that she says and does. And the Christian's faith in God, and those spiritual verities that lie beyond the reach of sense and demonstrative knowledge, are the chief elements and adornments of his spiritual life. "Seeing him who is invisible;" "looking at the things which are not seen;" "seeing not, yet believing"-here is the beauty and the strength of our holy religion.

The development of the "one God" into Father, Son and Holy Spirit was a matter of time, of ages, of intelligence and experience on the human side. Jehovah, God, Almighty, etc., were the names applied to the Supreme Being in the earlier history of mankind. The ideas or the designations of "Father," "Son" and "Holy Spirit" rarely occur in the Old Testament Scriptures. Occasionally they are thrown out as a flash of lightning upon the dark pathway of the untutored race—untutored in spiritual ideas—and as hints of a better covenant and a brighter day. It is in the New Testament that the ideas of Father, Son and Holy Spirit are revealed in their sublime and unspeakable mysteries and glories. We are chiefly dependent upon the Bible for our knowledge upon this subject.

The Holy Spirit operates—operates on matter, operates on mind, operates on the heart. Designating his energy from the nature of the object upon which it is expended, we may say the Holy Spirit exerts a physical, an intellectual and a moral power. Viewing the subject from the nature of the Holy Spirit himself, the energy which he expends, the power exerted in every instance is the same; it is spiritual power. Since he himself is spirit his power is essentially spiritual. Nor are we able to understand and explain the difference in the nature of the power put forth by the Spirit in his operations on matter and his operations on mind and on hearts. While we accept the plain scriptural teaching on this subject, it is unwise and unprofitable to engage in speculation, for who "by searching can find out God?"

CHRISTIANITY AND THE CHURCH.

SHERMAN HILL.

The difficulty with us in our investigations is not in a dearth of things to be considered, but rather in our failure to see things as they are.

If the philosopher were able to thread his way from conclusion to proposition he could arrive at the ultimate proposition, which is self-proposed.

If the scientist could make his way from effect to cause he would reach the first cause, which is self-caused. If we could comprehend one truth we could understand all truth.

We study a truth, we follow as best we can its leadings, but we fail to see it as it is and in its relations; hence we become confused. Our failure to see correctly, or in fullness, and our consequent confusion, is the result of our limited vision.

Few individuals are able to see a problem on many sides and from different angles. None are capable of comprehending a problem in its fullness, for the finite cannot comprehend the infinite.

Most individuals possess certain inherent predilections which denominate them as partialists. This is in keeping with the wisdom of creation, which has made it impossible for an equilibrium to be attained; but this impossibility does not warrant nor justify the opposite—an extreme. The ideal state is the one in which the tendency is toward rather than away from an equilibrium.

In religious thought some are inclined to the outer-the form, the objective; others to the inner—the substance, the subjective. This inclination to see but one feature has always resulted in what is represented in modern thought by occultism and materialism. One is immaterial, the other material; one is subjective, the other objective; one has to do with the inner life, the other with the outer; one inclines toward mysticism, the other toward rationalism. Every form of occultism is the result of attempting to resolve all into the subjective. Every form of rationalism or materialism is the result of attempting to resolve all into the objective.

The error is not in investigating and setting forth conclusions in either of these fields of thought, but in assuming finality and limiting it to either the sujective or the objective. Many sacred writers unmistakably betray the bent of their inclinations relative to these phases of thought. Matthew writes of the physical ancestors of Christ, records the prayer of the Savior that has to do with the physical largely, notes many parables that are drawn from the world about him, gives the commission in terms of the objective. John omits the ancestry of Christ and speaks of his relation to God. A comparison of Matt. 1 and John 1 will indicate the thought. John mentions the conversations, such as with Nicodemus and the woman at the well. rather than the parables. He relates the real prayer of the Master in the 17th chapter of his Gospel, which has to do chiefly with the subjective. His record of the commission as compared with Matthew's will indicate the thought perfectly. comparison of those Gospels throughout will demonstrate the idea of the inclination toward one or the other of these thoughts. But nowhere does either of these writers assume that he is representing the antiphase of thought or that he is exhausting the subject. Matthew was not a materialist, nor was John a mystic. The mystic's error is not in seeing as John wrote, but in not seeing as Matthew wrote. The materialist's error is not in seeing as Matthew wrote, but in not seeing as John wrote. Abraham's fault was in speaking but part of the truth for the whole. The mystic and the materialist are both at fault. They have mistaken a part for the whole. Much of the difficulty in Christendom is the result of overemphasizing one of these thoughts, which are not separate truths, but two features of one truth. Certain bodies of believers give undue emphasis to the outer. the form, the objective-to ritual and the ordinances Others give undue emphasis to the inner-the substance, the subjective. These two phases of one law run through all life. Either is dependent upon the other. They may be represented by the terms organization and organism. human body as an organization is necessary that life, the organism, may be sustained, and life is necessary that the body may be preserved.

The relation between Christianity and the church is similar to that of an organism and an organization. Both are divine in their nature and origin. Both are to be nurtured by divine direction. One is no less divine in its constitution and development than the other. Both are duly set forth in the Scriptures. The church is the means to Christianity-the end. The disposition to exalt Christianity and depreciate the church arises from the failure to see the relation between an organism and its organizationbetween Christianity and the church. To depreciate the church is to overlook a law that God has written in the constitution of all things. It is to defeat one's own end. It is to fight against God. The church does not perfectly reflect Christianity; it never will. He knows not his own life and power who expects a perfect reflection. The church is composed of men, consequently imperfect beings, seeking to reflect a perfect life. Christianity is a perfect organism seeking expression through an imperfect organization, since the individuals of the church are imperfect.

Christianity as reflected by Christ compared to Christianity as reflected by the church is an unjust comparison. The relation between Christianity and the church is becoming more perfect and vital. It is constantly approaching the divine ideal. The present attainments of the race in all that makes for a perfected and beautiful life in the sentiments of a real Christian spirit as compared with the past are most marked. These attainments are the fruitage of Christianity. But Christianity, much less its fruits, could not have been nor be but for the church, for an organism void of an organization is an impossibility. Christianity is a system reducible to practice in a real aggressive and largely effective sense through the church. The church is not a stereotyped institution, neither is it void of formulation and organization. Its organization depends upon the exigencies of the time and place and material at hand, which can be formed into a church that will meet the New Testament approval and warrant.

Neither is the Christian life a fixed or stereotyped life. It is of continual adjustment rather than fixed sameness. It is a matter of growth rather than rote. It is an ever-widening and deepening life. Ever becoming more real and effective. It must be a constant experiencing of an enlarged capacity and desire for God, rather than a disposition to self-sufficiency. In matters of thought it should ever be secure, but never final. Every achievement should be but a steppingstone to other and nobler ones till the entire being is in sympathy with the onmarching of God.

THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO JOHN MARK.

A. P. STOUT.

John Mark was the son of Mary Mark, who resided in Jerusalem (Acts 12:12). He was of Jewish parentage and cousin to Barnabas (Col. 4:10). Mark was not an avowed follower of the Christ, but belonged to the inner circle of disciples who often met at his mother's house. To this house Peter went as soon as he was liberated from prison (Acts 12:12). It was at the home of Mary Mark that the friendship between Mark and Peter was formed that resulted in the conversion of the former by the latter (1 Pet. 5:13).

John Mark accompanied Paul and Barnabas on their first missionary tour from Jerusalem to Perga, in Pamphylia, from which place he returned to Jerusalem (Acts 12:25; 13:13). One writer states that Mark was taken with Paul and Barnabas to baptize. If so, he must have baptized those who composed the church in Antioch, in Syria.

After Paul and Barnabas closed their first missionary tour they returned to Jerusalem. On starting out on their second missionary tour Mark went with them to Antioch, in Syria. This Antioch is located on the River Leontes, about thirty miles from the Mediterranean Sea, and about one hundred and seventy-five miles above Sidon. The first Gentile church was founded at this Antioch. Here the disciples were first called Christians (Christ-yans) by the pagans.

When about ready to leave Antioch for further missionary work Barnabas proposed to Paul that they take Mark with them. Paul objected, separated from Barnabas, took Silas and went to Silicia and Syria. Barnabas took his cousin, John Mark, and went to the island of Cyprus (Acts 15:36-41). In later years the alienation between Paul, Barnabas and Mark was healed, for when Paul was a prisoner at Rome he called Barnabas and Mark "fellow-workers," and commended them to the Colossian brethren (Col. 4:10; Phil. 23:24).

Jews were introduced into Rome by Pompius the Great, B. C. 63. When Paul wrote the Roman letter, A. D. 58, the Jews were a large and powerful community in Rome. Mark wrote the Gospel that bears his name in Rome about A. D. 65, thirty-five years after the death of the Christ, and evidently after the death of Paul and Peter. Mark wrote in Greek for the benefit of Jewish Christians and Roman Christians. Each spoke the Greek language. At the time Paul wrote the Roman letter, and at the time Mark wrote, the Christian Church at Rome was without regular organization. No officers are mentioned by either. Paul's keynote is: The gospel is the power of God for Jews and Romans.

It is commonly held that Mark was the companion of Peter in Rome and the interpreter of his sermons. This seems evident from the statement of Papius of Hierapolis in Phrygia. He died between 161 and 163. His statements are preserved by the historian Eusebius. Papius' statements are founded on the information of the elder John, and translated in the following words by Dr. Westcott: "This also the elder used to say: 'Mark, having become Peter's interpreter, wrote accurately all that he (Mark) remembered, or all that he (Peter) mentioned, though he did not record in order that which was either said or done by the Christ. For he neither heard the Lord nor followed him, but subsequently attached himself to Peter, who used to frame his teaching to meet the wants of his hearers, but not as, making a connected narrative of the Lord's discourses. So Mark committed no error, as he wrote down some particulars just as he recalled them to mind, or as he (Peter) narrated them. For he took heed to one thing: to omit none of the facts that he heard, and to make no false statement in his account of them'" (First Three Gospels-Carpenter).

Ireneus, who was born in Asia Minor and active in A. D. 180, says: "Since the decease of these (Peter and Paul) Mark, the disciple and interpreter of Peter, having handed down to us in writing the things which were preached by Peter" (Carpenter).

It is perfectly natural that after the death of Peter the Jewish Christians and Roman Christians should request Mark to preserve for them his reminiscence of the gospel of the Christ. The trend of the second Gospel is strongly in that direction.

In order that the Christ may be accepted by the Romans he must be presented to them free from Jewish law and all Judaism —as a strong, triumphant man—a hero. Mark's first mention of the Christ is when he comes forth a full-grown man from Nazareth to the Baptist to be baptized by him. He is such a hero as to fast forty days in the wilderness and hold the wild beasts at bay; then eclipses the Baptist in making disciples; goes into Galilee and sways the multitude by the grandeur of his thought and boldness of his speech. He died on the cross so grandly that the Roman centurion trembled and stood aghast.

JEWISH PHRASES AND CUSTOMS EXPLAINED.

Mark explains Jewish phrases and customs for Romans, both of which are omitted by Matthew (Mark 1:5; 2:14-18; 3:17; 5: 40; 7:11-34; 10:46; 11:13; 12:42; 13:3; 14: 12:36; 15:6; 16:34:42).

Matters that would alienate Romans from the Christ are omited by Mark (Matt. 6:7; 8:32; 10:5, 6). Mark does not use the word law, nor the words kingdom of heaven. He uses the word fulfilled only twice; the words kingdom of God thirteen times. Keynote: The Christ is the King of the human race; the *Son of God, who gradually grew into greater mentality, spirituality and purity than any one else.

Mark omits 555 verses of Matthew's Gospel (thirty-nine more than half of it), 795 of Luke's (more than two-thirds of it), 850 of St. John's (all of it save twenty-nine verses). Total omission by Mark, 2,200 verses, which is more than the Gospel of Matthew and Luke combined. We could dispose of Mark's Gospel with a loss of fifty verses of gospel history. Mark has seventeen leading quotations from the Old Testament as against twice that number in Matthew.

In the Latin Church in the fifth century Mark was represented by the lion.

HIGHER CRITICISM.

It is claimed that Mark wrote a memorabilia of events of the life of the Christ from the preaching of Peter, and that this document formed the basis of our present Gospel according to Mark. It is thought, too, by some of the latest Gospel critics that the "Sayings of the Lord," written by Matthew before writing his Gospel, was consulted by Mark in constructing his Gospel.

Drs. Martineau, E. A. Abbott, Sunderland, Cone and Prof. Estlin Carpenter hold the Gospel of Mark to be the earliest. Date, A. D. 70. In the Twentieth Century New Testament the Second G spel is placed first.

Testament the Second G spel is placed first. In speaking of the priority of the Gospel according to Mark, Prof. Carpenter says:

"Evidence points us to a Jewish author writing for Gentiles at a distance from his native land. The language is Greek, but not Greek of the literary and polished style which the author of our Third Gospel was well able to employ. It contains Greek words of a low sort, such as might be heard in the mongrel talk of the slaves or poor freedmen who formed the first congregations in the Mediterranean, and especially at Rome. . . This suggests Western origin of this Gospel. A curious little piece of evidence helps to confirm this view. The words ascribed to Jesus in 10:11,12, forbidding remarriage after divorce, imply that the wife might seek the separation. But this was not permitted to the Jewish woman. . . . It was allowed by the Roman

. . . It was allowed by the Roman law. Here is another link connecting this G spel with Rome."

^{*}Words Son of God omitted by good authority.

- —The Christian Monthly, Richmond, Va., Julian C. Anderson, editor and publisher, magazine form, 16 pages in tinted cover, will command respectful attention, both from its appearance and its contents.
- —Several new books are mentioned in our Literature department this week, and among them Sherman Hill's very high commendation of Public and Private Rights.
- —In this paper will be found a short but portentious message from Bro. Hunt concerning the outlook for missions in Central China. Some of the missionaries, he says, are leaving for the open ports; but he says: "We will not retreat."
- —The total receipts for Foreign Missions from October 1, 1899, to July 19, 1900, amount to $153,151.75, or a gain over the corresponding time of last year of $18,365.76. There has been a steady gain in the number of contributing churches, Sunday-schools and individual offerings.
- The article in this paper on "Christianity and the Church," by Sherman Hill, will bear close study. If those who are given to hair-splitting in the discussion of religious and theological questions would heed the logic of this article, much time and energy would be saved. It is a plain, commonsense article.
- —As chairman of the obituary committee of our state C. W. B. M., Mrs. S. E. Lampton, of Louisiana, Mo., asks those whose beloved ones have passed into the great beyond to furnish her with their names, and thus help her in preparing her report. Address her at 405 N. Main St., Louisiana, Mo.
- -Jas. W. Zachary, of Lexington, Ky., through the Quarterly Christian is waging an aggressive and strengous warfare against infidelity. In the copy just to hand, July, 1900, is a leading illustrated article of the infidel evolution theory. The illustrations are, of course, satirical.
- —About the middle of June last F. G. Tyrrell, of Chicago, was called to Huntsville, Mo., to deliver a series of lectures on the evils of intemperance. Huntsville has been a local option town for twelve years and is determined to maintain its record for sobriety and temperance. The five lectures delivered in the courthouse to large audiences by Bro. Tyrrell were pronounced the most stirring, vigorous lectures ever heard in that city. There is no compromise with evil in any of Bro. Tyrrell's sermons, lectures or public addresses.

- —The Spectator, published bi-weekly at Falmouth, Ky., by George Ringo, is an enterprising journal of more than ordinary ability and size for a local paper. It is deserving of a large patronage.
- —The Christian at Work is the name of a new paper published monthly in the interest of the church in Fortoria, Ohio. It is edited by S. M. Cook, R. W. Stancill and Mrs. Stancill. Vol. I., No. 1, is filled with substantial literature.
- —Owing to the anti sentiment of some of the brethren at Jamesport, M₂,, a second church has been organized, with 27 members, and since the organization there have been five additions by letter, six by statement and four by corfession. These brethren have rented the Baptist Church building for half time, and have secured W. E. Bates to preach for them on the third Lord's day in each month. The district convention was also to meet with this church on the 16th of the present month. The brethren have the Baptist house every Sunday afternoon for Bible-school and worship.
- —Joel Brown, field agent for the Christian Orphans' Home, recently presented to Willie Luckins, of Clay City, Ill., on behalf of the Orphans' Home, a beautiful teacher's Bible. Willie is a little boy picked up at Newton, Ill., by Bro Brown and placed in the home of Brother and Sister Thompson, of Clay City. This is the Christlike work that the Christian Orphans' Home is doing through its agents in the field, as well as within its walls in this city.
- —J. Preston Lewis bas written and published a new tract on "How God Says Baptism Is Performed." It is well written and instructive. He proposes to sell it in the interest and to aid in building up the newly organized church at Petersburg, Va. It is ten cents per copy. Write him for the tract, J. Preston Lewis, Petersburg, Va., and you will both receive a good tract and help a good cause.
- —The Orphans' Home at Louisville, Ky., has run behind about $1,000 during the year, and the board earnestly appeals to the friends of the orphan in Kentucky to come to their relief. The Home is run on the most economical basis possible, and yet the contributions have been inadequate. If there is an institution in the land that ought to be amply supported it is an orphans' home. It is to be hoped that the appeal made by the board through the Christian Guide will not go unheeded.
- -John J. McCann, an attorney of this city and a strong advocate of the single tax doctrine, is now serving a term of six months in the workhouse of the city because he refused to pay a real-estate license assessed by the city. He did not believe that the city had the right to assess such a license upon his business and fought the matter through all the courts up to the supreme court of the state. And now that the case has been confirmed in the supreme court he declines still to buy his liberty, pay the license and fine assessed by the court, or to accept the assistance of friends, and will serve his time of six months in the workhouse. This he does as a matter of principle and righteousness; his convictions would not let him do otherwise. And as soon as his sentence has expired he declares that he will continue the fight against this form of robbery and oppression. To tax a man on his only means of earning bread for his family and let valuable franchises belonging to rich corporations go tax free does not strike him as the fairest thing on earth between men. Of course, such a man will be called a fool, a crank and other slang names, but after all it must not be forgotten that the world owes its present liberties and conveniences very largely to such men.

- —We have an unusually large number of letters from our regular correspondents in this paper and they are each of unusual interest. They never seemed to write more fluently nor upon more thrilling themes. Any respectable notice of them would require much! space, so we simply say to our readers that in them you will find enjoyable reading.
- —The annual convention of the churches of Christ in Shelby county, Mo., will be held at Lakenan August 1-3. On the program, strong throughout, are the names of Davis Errett, L. H. Stine, H. F. Davis, J. O. Walton, J. W. Davis, Crayton Brooks and D. R. Dungan, for sermons and addresses.
- -Dick T. Morgan, a noted lawyer of Oklahoma, has prepared a manual of the homestead, townsite and mining laws of Oklahoma, a copy of which certainly ought to go into every household in that territory. Such a book of laws and explanations of important legal matters in every household would do much to prevent misunderstanding, neighborhood quarrels, lawsuits and no doubt murders. The majority of men desire to be law-abiding citizens of any country, but often they do not understand things and trouble arises. We believe that this honorable attorney and prominent member of the Christian Church in Perry, Okla., has rendered his fellow citizens a good service in the preparation of this book. Price, $1.00.
- —As we go to press we learn that Alexander Procter, Independence, Mo., is sinking very rapidly and that his end cannot be far off. It has been apparent for a long while to the nearer friends of Bro. Procter that his work here was done, but they had hoped that his departure might be delayed that the richness of his presence might continue to bless the church and the world. But the end is probably now not very far away.
- —Since the above mention of the probable death of Alexander Procter in the very near future a later dispatch announces his death. He died on Tuesday morning. Particulars will be given in our next issue.
- —The Rev. M. A. Mathews, of the First Presbyterian Church, of this city, has discovered a new mission field. In his sermon last Sunday he said in the reported sermon: "Our denominations must be Christianized." A capital suggestion this, and we should be glad to see the work begin at once. Here is an extract from his sermon, to which we wish to append our hearty Amen:
- Oh for a denominational regeneration, a thorough purification of our churches and a complete sanctification of our pulpits! Souls must be our only object and thought, if we ever prosper as the church of Christ. The time has come throughout this country for the churches to do more disinterested work—work for the salvation of souls and the moral education of men, regardless of the church to which they belong. Denominational selfishness results in the neglect of the individual, unsaved man. We get too busy in transferring members from one church to the other, raising money to gratify church pride and building up denominational fences.

May our churches support the weak, defend the poor and defenseless, cheer the discouraged, harbor and correct the wicked, lift the fallen, seek the lost, live lives of love and sacrifice, fall into the bosom of humanity, die and come forth glorified Christian lives.

The Search-Light, published at Worcester, Mass, in the interest of the church in that city, for July 14 contains an excellent likeness of Dr. B. B. Tyler, who has been doing some highly appreciated work for them this month.

- W. E. Hall, of New York City, recently delivered a course of lectures in Asheville, N. C., to a crowded house. Of his lectures T. M. Myers says: "We have never heard his equal as a power to draw and hold an audience.
- G. E. Shanklin, of Stanberry, Mo., announces that he is at liberty to engage with any church desiring a pastor, or with churches within 100 miles of Marshall, Mo., for part time. Here is an op-portunity for a preacherless church to get a substantial man and preacher.
- W. H. Johnson, of Springdale, Ark., has accept ed a call to the Church of Christ in Rock Island, Bro. Johnson becomes successor to Bro. W. T. Grafton, to whom the church in Rock Island is greatly i debted for its present position and influence in that city.
- W. H. Winters, of Flora, Ill., has launched a four-page paper in the interest of the churches of Christ in Clay county, Ill., called the Flora Christian, and to appear monthly. The first numbers, one and two, present a very creditable appearance.

After two years of successful work at Carrollton. Ill., the pastor, J. Seymour, has resigned to take eff-ct September 1. A very high appreciation of his sermons and work has been expressed and his leaving will be deeply regretted by the church and city.

The First Christian Church in Guthrie, Okla., gave Bro. Ogle and his family a most cordial reception in the commencement of his work in that city. The reception was attended by the citizens of Guthrie irrespective of church lines. Bro. Ogle and his new parish the most abundant success in the Master's work.

Churches in need of a pastor are requested to communicate with H. W. McKane, Newark, N. J. Bro. McKane is a young married man of experience and a ility and has given satisfaction in the churches of the East where he has served. Any further particulars may be had of J. M. Philputt, 148 W. 119th St., N. Y

Barclay Meador, advertising agent for the CHRISTIAN EVANCELIST, left this city on Monday night for a vacation trip. He will join his wife at Colorado Springs and they will then travel together visiting places of interest as far as to Butte, Mont. We wish them a pleasant trip.

J. W. Monser, of Columbia, Mo., nas been delivering a series of carefully prepared lectures, each Sunday morning, on the "Authenticity of Genesis," to a large class of the state's best teachers. These teachers are attending the summer term of the State University an will carry this light into the remotest parts of the state. Verily the church there has a great mission and "the pastor and his church are equal to the responsibility."

Dr. W. T. Moore and Mrs. W. T. Moore of Columbia, Mo., expect to go to Macatawa, Mich., this week, to spind a season with friends at that popular summer resort.

Joel Brown, agent for the Benevolent Association and the Christian Orphans' Home, was in the city this week in conference with the C.B. A.B. as present and future plans and work Brown was on his way to Bethany Assembly where he is to deliver an address on this work on Thurs-day of this week. Bro. Brown is very hopeful and full of enthusiasm in the work.

E. J. Lampton has resigned at Louisiana, Mo., to take effect the 1st of September. Bro. Lampton has preached for that church for nearly eight rears. These have been active years of fruitful abor. The church has been built up in memberlabor. ship and increased in faith and good works. ing these years a handsome new church has been built and paid for. Some good church wanting a strong preacher and successful pastor has a chance in Bro. Lampton.

E. V. Zollars.

On our first page this week appears an excellent likeness of E. V. Zollars, president of Hiram College. Ely Vaughn Zollars was born September 19, 1847, near Salem, Washington County, O. On his father's side Bro. Zollars is of German extraction, but on his mother's side he is a Puritan. His father, Abram Zollars, and his family were among the first people in that part of Ohio to embrace the restoration movement inaugurated by the Campbells. E. V. Zollars began his married life on a farm, teaching school in the winter, but was determined upon a higher education, and in 1871 he entered Bethany College, from which he graduated in 1875. After his graduation he first became a professor of ancient languages in the college from which he graduated, and on the second year its financial agent, in which year, 1877, notwithstanding the panic, he raised $27,000 in pledges and money. In 1878 he accepted the presidency of Kentucky Classical Business College at North Middletown, where he remained for seven years. He next became the president of Garrard Female College at Lancaster, Kv., which he gave up after one year that he might devote himself wholly to the ministry and accepted a call to the pastorate of the church in Springfield, Ill. While at Springfield the church prospered under his care and increased in membership from 300 to 600. But his reputation as an educator would not permit him to remain the pastor of this or any other church. In 1888 he was called to the presidency of Hiram College, which position he still holds. And of his work here the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST has spoken at 1 ngth in its educational and other editions. Before his college course he was married to Miss Hulda Louisa McAtee of Washington County, O., in whom he found a helpful companion. One child, now Mrs. Pag , was born to them. Bro. Zollars is now in the prime of his life and in the midst of a grand work and has every hope for many years of service for the Master and for his fellowmen as a preacher of the gospel and an educator. His work at Hiram is a work that is giving hope and life to other colleges, and elevating the cause of our colleges greatly in the estimation of the brotherhood.

Added in China.

This message across the seas announces that a little son was born to us in Chu Cheo, Central China, on June 5th, at noon. Dr. and Mrs. Osgood were in attendance. Our joy was enhanced in the fact that it was Russell Osgood's first birth lay. The Chinese Christians helped celebrate both oc casions. These little children have a ministry which is destined to remold the Chinese home life. When the Chinese home life is purified the nation will be won. Our missionary home life must be the illustration of the Christian character. W. REMERY HINT

Luther's Language.

I notice a question in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of July 19th concerning Luther's attitude in regard to the use of his name as a distinguishing term in connection with the church and Christian teaching.

In McClintock and Strong's Encyclopedia article, Lutheran, is this language quoted:

"His peculiar views, which we will now denominate Lutheranism, spread rapidly, especially after the Diet of Worms (1521), and though as late as 1522 Luther himself wrote: you above all things not to use my name; not to call yourselves Lutherans but Christiang' (Works xviii. 299 in the 6th Leips, Ed.; compare also Gelzer, Life of Luther, pp. 288-291)."

If your querist will consult the above works he will find the information he seeks as to Luther.

It will be found that most if not all great reformers have, in their original purpose, designed to call the church back to apostolic teaching, but the history cannot be written without terms to designate such a movement and it is difficult, if not impossible, to avoid using such terms denowinationally. This is true whether the terms are chosen from Scripture or from other sources. The spirit of denominationalism and the fact of denominations, or named movements and organizations should not be confounded. The first assumes that division is right; the latter is an effort to express intelligently things as they exist.

DIFFICULT TO BELIEVE ADVICE APPLIES TO US.

"While reading the morning paper at breakfast I frequently read over the advertisements of Postum Food Coffee and finally began to wonder if it was a fact that my daily headache and dyspepsia were due to coffee drinking.

"It never occurred to me that the warning fitted my case.

"I had been on the diet cure for more than ten years, having tried a strictly meat diet, also a strictly vegetable diet and at times left off breakfast for a time and again left off dinner, but all these efforts were futile in ridding me of the steady half sick condition under which I labored.

"I had never once thought of overhauling "dear old coffee," but when it finally occurred to me to make the trial and take up Postum, I immediately discovered where the difficulty all these years came from. I now eat anything for breakfast, as much as I desire, doing justice to a good meal, and the same at lunch and dinner, with never a headache or other disagreeable symptom. My only 'crankiness' now is to know that I have Postnm served as it should be made, that is, properly boiled. There is a vast difference between poorly made Postum and good.

"C. E. Hasty, of Alameda, Calif., insists that he owes his life to me because I introduced him to Postum. I have a number of friends who have been finally cured of stomach and bowel trouble by the use of Postum Food Coffee in place of regular coffee.

Rebellion in China.

The rebellion in the capital of the empire portends vividly the swift destruction which will waste the cities and impoverish the state. Already some half a dozen cities besides Pekin are in the hands of the rebels. Native Christians have been massacred, churches destroyed and foreign missionaries and other civilians murdered.

The outlook was never so black. Nanking is in a state of ferment. Numbers of influential Chinese and foreigners are leaving the interior for the open ports.

Missionary work will receive a temporary throwback, but we will not retreat. God is with W. R. HUNT. us. Pray, pray, pray!

"Turn on the Light."

Bro. M. M. Davis wants to know if President McKinley drinks liquor. Samuel Dickie and John G. Woolley, both members of the recent General Conference of the M. E. Church, testify that Mc-Kinley emptied his glass of liquor, at a Chicago banquet last fall, as often as other guests did. While there he was entertained by a prominent member of the National Liquor Dealers' Association. In Peoria he was entertained by a prominent distiller, and in Cincinnati by the leading brewer. He has wine in the White House for all state occasions. I wonder how many Christians will vote for our wine-bibbing President.

The following ominous cable message came July 16th from the interdenominational committee in Bombay, of which Brother M. D. The prospects are now adverse to any improvement in the suffering, and the situation has become a terrible one. Premature Criticism.

As has been stated, the articles that have appeared in the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST under the heading, "Spiritual Side of Our Plea," are only some advance pages from a book soon to be published by the Christian Publishing Company. It is not expected that the author will notice premature attacks on a book before it is published and permitted to speak for itself in its entirety and maturity. Indeed, it is not to be expected that ordinary men would crudely criticise a promised book until it has made its appearance. Extraordinary men, of course, are expected to have extraordinary ways. Genius was always erratic.

Twenty-five cents is a small sum, but it is sufficient to obtain a copy of "Christian Science Dissected," the latest and best work on the follies, fallacies and frauds of Mrs. Eddy and her follow ers. The work is not at all abstruse. It is written in the plainest style. It deals sledgehammer blows at the Christian Science lunacy and at the same time affords much amusement for the reader.

Rather be Right than to be Great.

EDITOR CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:-I read the English Topics regularly. As one of those who disagree with Bro. Wm. Durban in political con clusions, I would like to ask him why should large, strong nations ignore the Golden Rule and rob the smaller nations right and left rather than for a large, strong individual to play the bully and ignore the rights of weaker neighbors? If it is right in one case it must be in the other. How can it be consistent for a Christian to advocate such politics?

For my part, I would rather be snuffed out of history than to encourage that which I think is wrong and inconsistent with Christ's teaching. may be wrong, but I have not been convinced of it yet, and probably will remain a "Little American," as Bro. Durban designates those of my caliber. However, I am open to conviction and would like to go with the majority if they are in the right; if they are not, I would rather be Yours truly, Cedar Rapids, Ia., July 3, 1900.

[We have no doubt but that Bro. Durban and our readers will heartily agree with our brother, that no great nation has any right to ignore the Golden Rule, or to rob smaller natious of any rights or of liberty to govern themselves. We cannot too highly commend the ethical standard of our brother, who would rather be "snuffed out of history" than to encourage what he thinks "is wrong and inconsistent with Christ's teaching." There is, of course, room for difference of judgment, however, as to what extent, if any, Great Britain or our own nation has violated these principles in their dealings with other nations. These national problems are not so simple as they may appear to be to a snperficial observer. Let us, therefore, be charitable in our judgment of others while we all seek to emphasize the princi ples which our brother has stated.—EDITOR.]

Chautauqua Assembly.

The Chautauqua Herald of the 11th inst. gives in full Prof. H. L. Willett's lecture on the "Bible in Modern Thought."

He was at Disciples' headquarters Sunday morning and conducted communion service. In the ampitheatre at eleven he spoke a full hour and a quarter on heart devotion to the Bible and to the Christ, the one great thought and idea of the Bible. The logic of all his reasoning and bearing of Scriptures upon the subject was so complete that it was spoken of by thinkers as a constant array of thought and fact for an hour without a break. Thousands listened intently for the words portraying the life of the Son of God.

I note some points of the Saturday lecture. The Bible is the most important book in the world. It teaches how to know God and how to be saved from sin. It has passed through persecution, suppression, ridicule and new rationalistic criticism, such doing its best to undermine the power and authority of the Word of God. Its danger is from neglect of its friends. We do not feel safe in keeping house without a Bible, and may have one on our center tables and dust it off when the preacher comes. Peter and Paul are deep and hazy features in the background of the past. Many students to-day quickly asked to turn to Ezra would be puzzled to know if it was after Second Timothy or Second Chronicles. In closing this splendid lecture he said: "This is where the Bible begins: 'God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have everlasting life.' The whole Bible is itself the marriage ring that unites the heavens and the earth, and the priceless setting of that marriage ring, that jewel which is beyond all other jewels of the universe, the life of Christ, is here on the earthward side." Earnest men who heard these thoughts by this young man who forgets himself and is absorbed in his theme said these Bible truths are what we all need and to which we must all come that the Word of God may be glorified among men.

People here, without regard of denomination, are glad to hear the Scriptures exalted.

The Lands of the Long Day .- III.

CHRISTIANIA AND TELEMARKEN.

Norway begins just where Sweden leaves off, not only geographically but topographically. Little rudimentary fjords have begun to indent the coast south of the Swedish boundary; north of it they become longer and deeper. The hills are gradually becoming more majestic as we pass from one country to the other, and the forests, with their tall, straight pines, are gaining in dignity. By gradations one emerges from a region which is only desolate and sterile into one whose wildness has a larger mold and whose very desolation weaves a charm about the beholder. As a young Norse sailor said to me, while we were coming up the Christiania Fjord in a boat, "Norway and Sweden are both barren lands, but Norway has romance." The term romance in that connection is rather hard to define-I'm sure I couldn't do it satisfactorily-but any one could see what the man meant, and I agree with him.

I inquired of this intelligent young sailor what he thought was the sentiment of the common people in Norway in regard to the separation of the two kingdoms, Sweden and Norway. [The reader will remember that the two countries have separate laws and parliaments, but a common king, as England and Scotland had between the union of the crowns under James I., in 1603, and the parliamentary union under Queen Anne, in 1705.] He said that personally he was a Conservative; that is, he favored maintaining the union, but that most of the common people were radically in favor of separating from Sweden. Just why they wanted to separate he didn't know, and he doubted whether they knew, but there was a general feeling that in a union of two unequal powers the weaker would surely get the worst of the bargain sooner or later. The most specific demand of the Liberal party is that Norway shall be represented in foreign lands by a separate set of consular officers instead of the Swedes, who now hold almost all of the consulates. A little more than a year ago the Norwegian Parliament authorized the use of the separate Norse flag in place of the flag of the union. This distinctively Norse flag, without the Swedish emblem, is the one which is seen most commonly throughout the country. It is as if Scotland should leave the English emblem, the St. George cross, out of the Union Jack, and fly only the Scottish St. Andrew's cross. The testimony of many other witnesses confirms the opinion that the great majority of Norwegians, especially in the towns, are in favor of the separation of the kingdoms.

A pleasant sail of thirty miles up the Christiania Fjord brought me to the Norse capital with its magnificent harbor. It was ten o'clock when I arrived—just a few minutes after sunset. My watch had stopped a few days before, and it was very embarrassing to try to guess at the time in a country where the sun rises before three and sets at ten. I had to estimate the flight of time by reference to my cyclometer, a pocket compass and my appetite. One has a certain eternal premonition when it is getting about noon, and that quite independent of the hours of sunrise and sunset. But I took pains to seek a hotel adjacent to a church-tower with a clock, and by good fortune got a room on that side.

A German speaking Dane, with whom I fell into conversation at the hotel, gave me a characterization of Christiania upon which I have not yet been able to improve: "A little city with one big street." It is a city of more than 300,000, but it appears smaller because of its condensation. Its one great street, the Karl Johans, Gade, holds the place which is occupied by the Unter den Linden in Berlin, or Princes Street in Edinburg. This street is bounded at one end by the principal railway staton; at the other by the royal palace, where the king, by the terms of the union, is required to live three months in every year. Between these and on this street lie not only all the important business bouses and leading hotels, but the Great Market, the most important church, the postoffice, the House of Parliament, the National Theatre and the University-and all within threequarters of a mile. It is a well-built town, distinctly handsome in places, but noisy out of all proportion to the amount of business that is being done. On its rough-paved streets every passing wagon makes as much noise as a load of steel

The American consul at Christiania is an accommodating gentleman, who devoted a good deal of his time to my interests. He is Norse by birth, but has lived long in America, and is so thoroughly Americanized that he is anxious for his term to expire so that he can return. I was interested in his estimate of the Norwegian liquor law. He admits that there has been some decrease of drunkenness in recent years, since the law went into effect, but still considers it ineffective as a means of controlling the evil. There are about sixty "drunk-and-disorderly" arrests in Christiania daily, which is far too high an average for so small a city. It means ten per cent. of the population annually. The consul suspects that the law is probably much more effective in the country districts.

The Russian consul-general is also an agreeable gentleman, who speaks English, French, German, Norse, Russian, and I know not how many other languages. We found those five quite sufficient for our communications, especially as his English was excellent. He gave my passport the necessary vise for traveling in Russia, and appeared interested in my project of entering his country by way of Lapland, which, however, he plainly considered an idiodic thing to do, though he was far too courteous to say so. He suspected that I would find no comfortable means of travel in that region, and indeed I didn't know that I would find any.

Christiania lies not far from the eastern edge of Norway. The best of the scenery which has made Norway famous is found on the west coast. beginning in about the latitude of Christiania and running north and northeast. Between Christiaria and the Hardanger Fford, which lies due west of it, there intervenes a tract of mountainous country known as Telemarken. To cross this was my first task. It proved to be a ride of something more than two hundred miles through the mountains, over roads which varied from fair to wretched. The first part of my route was over an old road now little used, most travelers making a detour by rail and steamer on a chain of lakes and joining this route near the middle. It will, of course, be understood that there is no railway across Telemarken; and, indeed, there are very few railways anywhere in Norway.

It is the first part of this trip which the cautious Baedeker characterizes as "unadvisable." So it is, if quality of roads counts for anything. Ill-made, rocky and sandy, they would be practically impassable for bicycles if it were not for the chance of finding a narrow strip of solid ground at the edge or a path at one side. Hills rapidly grow into mountains as one journeys west. The scenery becomes grand, even awe-inspiring. But the road plunges on, up and down mountain sides, with no pretense of engineering and with a criminal disregard for human life. Nowhere in the Alps or the Apennines have I ever seen a road so take the bit in its teeth and dash down impossible slopes, or again rear on its hind legs while it clambers up where avalanches might come down. It was a most interesting road.

But here and there, even in this reckless section, there would be a piece of real engineering, and there are one or two bits of grand scenery combined with magnificent road which in my memory shine out in this expanse of toilsome hills like a good deed in a naughty world. There is, for instance, the descent into the valley of Flatdal—which, by the way, instead of being flat, is surrounded by some of the highest mountains in Telemarken. In easy windings and zigzags the road, with a surface now above reproach, works its way down a mountain side, and it is good coasting all the way. It was a blissful finish to a hard day's work.

My traveling companion that evening was a dog. I have been a good deal interested in noticing the different kinds of dogs in different parts of Europe-the disreputable curs which bark at everybody up and down the Rhine, the little, snappy, black dogs in the Swiss towns, the shepherd dogs which always mind their own business, the thievish-looking dogs of Italy, which (like most people in Italy) never have any business to mind. the industrious, big dogs of Holland and Belgium which draw carts. In Schleswig-Holstein the dachshund is prevalent, and in Denmark one sees many fine, savage-looking Danish mastiffs. But Denmark has also another variety, the most illfavored, ill-conditioned and ill-mannered brutes west of Constantinople. But they add to their malice a certain admirable ingenuity, for they divide the road into sections, like policemen's beats, and patrol it systematically, looking for wheelmen. When a wheelman appears they pass him on from one to the next; where one leaves him the next takes him up. For the dogs it is a relay race; for the cyclist, a continuous ovation.

Norwegian dogs are, in general, much letter natured. There was this one, for instance, who accompanied me the better part of the afternoon and into Flatdal. His only vice was that he insulted my speed. It was very hard riding where he joined me, and I suppose he was not geared so high as I was. Anyway, he outran me. Not content with that, he would stop to wait for me, showing all signs of impatience. He thought I was very slow, and showed it by all kinds of insulting remarks-something I will permit no dog to do. Any canine who joins my party without invitation does so on his own responsibility, and must not expect to set the pace for the entire expedition. When we came to the above-mentioned good road I bumped into him once or twice and then ran away from him. He ultimately caught up, but a coolness sprang up between us, and we stopped at different hotels that night.

It was the next morning at a mountain-top village, consisting of a church and two houses, that I ran across a cattle fair and market. There were fifty or seventy-five of their long-horned, dwarf cows in a pen, and quite a crowd of people had assembled. An old woman had a stand where she dispensed seltzer (the Norse equivalent of pink lemonade), cigars and fried potatoes to such as felt justified in expending two or three cents on the strength of a good bargain in cattle. The people were dressed in their national costume... For the men this seems to be a shabby suit of any sort. But for the women-with a man's natural incapacity for describing woman's dress, I shrink from the task. I must make some more observations before I attempt it.

The second half of the journey across Telemarken was much easier. The road is one of the excellent eystem of new roads which the Norwegian Government has built in recent years. Snowy mountains soon come in sight. Soon I am among them. Gradually the road ascends through an unpeopled wilderness. The road itself and a single long-distance telephone wire are the sole tokens of civilization. Trees disappear. A patch of snow lies by the road. As one proceeds the scene becomes arctic. Lakes filled with floating ice are passed. The snow lies not in patches, but in solid fields and drifts, through which the road has been cut. And now, past Hankeli Saeter, begins the ascent of Dyreskard Pass, but most of the climbing has already been done in the long approach. One deep drift lies still in the way, and over this the road climbs. From the top of the pass there is such a scene of frozen desolation as I never expected to see in June south of the Arctic Circle. And still the altitude is not high, only 3,300 feet. But the snow-line here is 5,000 feet lower than in the Alps.

In an hour from the top of the pass I had dropped agai into the zone of civilization, and was in the fertile though mountain-girt valley of the Roldalsvand. Norway was practically W. E. GARRIRON. crossed.

AN AMERICAN INVASION OF BRITAIN.

Another of the annual invasions of this country by Americans has commenced. Several extra attractions this year combine to bring multitudes of our welcome friends eastward. Some of these are the Passion Play at Oberammergua, the Paris Exposition and the World's Christian Endeavor Convention. The latter is drawing about 10,000 American visitors. The summer is cool and delightful, though somewhat wet at times. Our English climate is much abused; but after having tasted the atmosphere in many lands I am bound to say that the English meteorological conditions are the most favorable on earth for the double purpose of work and pleasure. Nowhere can a man work so many hours a day on so many days through the year, and nowhere can life be better enjoyed continuously. Among the noted Americans preaching as visitors in England are Mr. Sheldon and Dr. Lorimer. Dr. Talmage has flitted away to Russia.

THE WEARY TITAN.

Once more Britannia finds that her hands are full, But to this kind of political pleroma she is accustomed. The English people are not easily disconcerted or dismayed by excessive burdens of home and foreign responsibility. They expect to have to bear enormous burdens entailed by imperial entanglements to which there can be no end. But England's heart is aching. We have not recovered from the shocks occasioned through the losses incurred in the South African war, before the petty mutiny at Kumasi has brought anxiety about precious lives. And now we have to share with all the great civilized nations, including America, the fearful dread of a holocaust in China. We have three wars on our hands at once. My own impression is that it will be long be ore r the world will be at peace again. I cannot bel'e s is the will of God that it should be so.
My , sividual views may be worth little enough, but every man should attentively watch for himself the signs of the times and draw his own conclusions. It seems to me, then, that in coolly and disdainfully forgetting that not long ago Christendom allowed the Turk to destroy helpless and innocent Armenia, the chief Christian nations of the world are at the same time forgetting God, to whom the blood of 100,000 of that splendid race of Christians in Asia Minor cries for vengeance. All the great powers were guilty of cowardice. All tacitly leagued themselves together into a confederation of tolerance for the incarnation of Satan who was proved directly guilty of ordering wholesale assassinations. Well, that base plot succeeded, and the "Concert of Europe" marched along to the accompaniment of shrieks and groans of outraged and massacred Christians. At this moment the Sultan calmly proceeds to defy America. None can make him afraid. His hour is not yet come. His cup is not yet full. But all the Christian nations which have meanly entered into complicity with this manufacturer of hell on earth now find themselves confronted by an unexpected agent of retribution. The Sultan confined himself to the slaughter of his own innocent subjects. But the Chinese Imperial Tiger, Prince Tuan, who has deposed the Empress Dowager, is not afraid to hurl defiance at United Europe and the United States of America and Japan also. Here is a turning of the tables with unspeakable vengeance. What is coming? I note that a great many political and literary opportunists and dreamers are expecting that after a short time of trouble, with some disasters, the whole imbroglio will be settled and the volcano at Pekin will be extinguished. Not so. There is the hand of God to be reckoned with. Providence has ordained that the great carnal governments which bear the name of Christian shall be called to bear the torture of chastisement at the hands of the Chinese dragon for their inhuman patience while the Turkish demon executed in blood and fire the decree of hell-"Delenda est Armenia!"

CHINA'S GREATEST MISSIONARY.

The most distinguished missionary now in China is an Englishman, the Rev. Dr. Griffith John, of the London Missionary Society. This veteran is near'y 70 years of age, and has labored amongst the "Celestia's" for forty-five years with wonderful zeal and hope. His work has lain principally about Hankow, whence at intervals of every few years he has made several missionary journeys into Hunan, the province most fanatically opposed to Christianity. A year ago Dr. John wrote home describing his fourth visit to Hunan, and in jubilant terms contrasting his experiences then with the reception at the time of his third journey, two years previously, when officials and people showed him nothing but uccompromising opposition. Last year it was "roses, roses all the way." Officials were smiling and helpful, the people friendly and curious, and converts crowded to be baptized. The kaleidoscopic suddenness of the recent change is only another illustration of the fickleness of the Chinese in relation to Christian missions, however constant they may be in other directions. It is now eighteen years since Dr. John came home on furlough. In 1888 he was elected chairman of the Congregational Union of England and Wales of 1889, but on account of the mission field he declined the honor.

NEW LIGHT ON EGYPTIAN DARKNESS.

Thoughtful students in London are being delighted this month with the finest exhibition of antiquities ever yet displayed to the public. The most illustrious of living Oriental explorers is Prof. Flinders Petrie, a member and by far the most distinguished member of the Palestine and Egyptian Exploration Society. At University College is at this moment being shown his collection of antiquities discovered during his work the last season at the ancient cemetery of Abydos. Only one-half the objects secured from these wonderful sandheaps in the desert are here displayed, the other half being retained by the authorities at Ghizen. Only those who know something of ancient history can appreciate the unspeakable importance of this exhibition. The site of Abydos, the sacred city of Osiris, has long been expected to yield records of the earliest dynasties of Egypt. Prof. Petrie and his assistants have gained priceless memorials of Menes and his successors. All the tombs were opened and identifications were made of the resting-places of the seven kings of the first Egyptian dynasty and two kings who reigned prior to Menes. Among the objects obtained from these sepulchres are portions as a small crystal vase, instribed with the name of Menes, the date of which, according to Prof. Petrie, is about B. C. 4,700. The objects in the same case show that we have by no means reached the beginnings of Egyptian civilization. The beautiful drinking and libation bowls made of marble, granite, quartz and alabaster, show that at that wonderfully remote period the Egyptians had mastered the art of working the hardest material and of imparting a high polish to the surface. One class of objects attracting much admiration are the carved ivories. Ivory must have been very plentiful at that time. Among the objects are some beautifully carved feet of bulls which had formed the supports of chairs and cabinets. the gem of the ivories is a small box for green eye-paint, carved out of a solid piece of ivory a few inches long. It is in the form of two half ducks which fit exactly together and are fastened by entwined tails. For finish this lovely production, although 7,000 years old, is equal to the finest Japanese work. Some of the ivory wards and tablets are exquisitely finished with geometrical patterns, and show much artistic merit. The pottery and vases are particularly interesting. The small hand-made pottery ware from the royal tombs is very curious.

STRANGE VOICES FROM THE DEAD.

I want to impress on my readers what this Egyptian exposition means. These discoveries are of a far greater importance than any yet made. They are voices from the dead indeed. They carry one back to nearly 5,000 years before the birth of Christ. They complete the whole of the dynasties named on the famous table right back to the first, B. C. 4,777-4,514, which is touched now for the first time. They even go beyond into prehistoric time. The first astounding feature about these discoveries is that they entirely upset all notions hitherto obtained about Egyptian art. Instead of the Egyptian art we have hitherto known being but the beginnings, the initial strivings of a people to express themselves, that art is clearly shown to be debased and degenerated from an infinitely superior form many generations earlier. We have to accept the fact, notwithstanding all that we were devoutly taught in our childhood, according to dear old Archbishop Usher, that the recent discoveries in Egypt show that a high state of civilization existed in Egypt some centuries before the date to which it has been the custom to assign the creation of the world. Deafness Cannot Be Cured by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure Deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets imflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

Do not infer, please, from what I said last week about the Pilgrims, that I do not appreciate their character and work. From our point of view their thoughts and ways were in some respects rediculous, but they were great and good men. As they are studied in their place in the history of our race a sense of their greatness increases. The Mayflower Pilgrims were colossal men. Common men do not undertake and carry forward for themselves and their posterity what the founders of the Pilgrim Republic conceived and accomplished. They were God's men. His Spirit inspired themhis hand was on them. They were divinely appointed agents for the accomplishment of God's gracious purposes concerning the race. They were his chosen people as certainly as were the Jews. It is not more certain that he guided the children of Israel across the wilderness to the promised land than it is that he directed, the Mayflower across the Atlantic in 1620. If you doubt the correctness of this position read again, and with care, the record of their experiences in England, Holland and in North America. There is no other rational explanation of the story.

Distinguish between the Pilgrims and the Puritans. They were not the same people. Both were intensely religious. Both were very earnest Prot-They protested against the errors in estants: belief and life of the Anglican Church-the body of which they were members. But the Pilgrims were extremists in this respect: They said, in effect, the church cannot be saved. You cannot reform it. The only thing to do, so far as the Angelican communion was concerned was to abandon it. They were what we would call Come-The Puritans desired quite as earnestly a purer faith than that of the English Church and a more scriptural character of life, but they said this can best be secured by remaining in the fellowship of the church. There were, of course, extremists among the Puritans; but this roughly sets forth the differences between the Pilgrims and the Puritans. The settlers of Plymouth were Pilgrims, the settlers of Salem and Boston were Puritans.

The Pilgrims did not persecute; the Puritans did. When life was made unpleasant for Roger Williams in Salem he found a comfortable and welcome asylum in Plymouth. He preached in Plymouth two years. The Pilgrims did not believe all that Williams believed and taught, but they were tolerant. It is not known why Williams returned to Salem, it is known that he was thought well of in Plymouth, and that the Pilgrims desired him to remain with them. One of the chief men among the Pilgrims was a Romanist—Captain Myles Standish. It is not probable that the Puritans would have honored Standish as the Pilgrims honored him.

Roger Williams was a rantankerous sort of man. He was an ardent believer in a certain kind of liberty-as almost every one is; but it was next to impossible to live with him in peace. Such a man as he was, in our time, is called a Crank with a capital C! He not only withdrew from the church but from almost everything else. He could not endure Boston; the people of Boston were too liberal for him. This is the reason why he went to Salem after his arrival in in this country. And remember that the Boston that was too liberal for Roger Williams was the Boston of the seventeenth century, not of the nineteenth-ancient, not modern Boston. You know that he came to oppose engaging in worship when unregenerate persons were present-and he was to be the sole judge as to who were and were not regenerated! He opposed the administration of an oath to an unregenerate man on the ground that a judicial oath is an act of worship! Because the church in Salem declined to do something that he desired he withdrew from it, and then because his wife con tinued to attend he withdrew from her—he would not permit her to be present at family prayers, on the ground that the was an unregenerate sinner!!

The Salem colony did not send Roger Williams into the wilderness to live with the Indians. Salem decided, for her own peace, to send Williams back to England. A ship was in the harbor ready to sail. Williams preferred to go to an Indian tribe with which he had some acquaintance, and so stealthily he left the colony. Roger Williams banished himself. He had a rough time of it, but he had only himself to blame. He could have returned to England and lived in comfort. But his course turned out to be a blessing. He became the founder of a free state in the wilderness. But Rhode Island was cranky for a long time. She was the last of the thirteen original states to adopt the constitution under which we so happily live. But Lord Baltimore preceded Roger Williams in the founding of a free state. To Maryland and not Rhode Island belongs the honor of being the first commonwealth in which religious freedom was guaranteed and enjoyed. Roger Williams was a Baptist for six months-Lord Baltimore was a Roman Catholic!

Returning to the founder of the Pilgrim Republic: John Robinson, their pastor, in Holland, was a remarkable man. You have doubtless seen the words—"The Lord has more truth to break forth out of his Holy Word"—attributed to him.

This quotation is from his farewell discourse to the Pilgrims on the eve of their embarkation at Delft Haven. The discourse was delivered July 21, 1620; they sailed the next day. Thinking that you may not have seen the sermon I give you, in this place, the paragraph in which the familiar quotation is found. Mr. Robinson said:

"Brethren, we are now quickly to part from one another, and whether I may ever live to se your face on earth any more the God of heaven only knows; but whether the Lord hath appointed that or not, I charge you before God and his blessed angels, that you follow me no farther than you have seen me follow the Lord Jesus Christ.

"If God reveal anything to you by any other instrument of his, be as ready to receive it as ever you were to receive anything by my ministry, for I am verily persuaded—I am very confident—that the Lord has more truth to break forth out of his Holy Word. For my part I cannot sufficiently bewail the condition of the reformed churches, who are come to a period in religion, and will go at present no farther than the instruments of their reformation. The Lutheran cannot be drawn to go beyond what Luther saw! Whatever part of his will our good God has revealed to Calvin they will rather die than embrace it. And the Calvinists, you see, stick fast where they were left by that great man of God, who yet saw net all things.

"This is a misery much to be lamented;, for though they were burning and shining lights in their times, yet they penetrated not into the whole counsel of God; but were they now living would be as willing to embrace further light as that which they first received. I beseech you, remember it is an article of your church covenant 'that you be ready to receive whatever truth shall be made known to you from the written word of God.' Remember that and every other article of your sacred covenant. But I must herewithal exhort you to take heed what you receive as truth. Examine it, consider it and compare it with other Scriptures of truth before you receive it; for it is not possible that the Christian world should come so lately out of such thick anti-Christian darkness, and that perfection of knowledge should break forth at once."

Am I not warranted in saying that Pastor John Robinson was a remarkable man? The words here quoted were pronounced 280 years ago.

Have WE all truth? Is there more truth to be found in the Bible than WE have discovered? Are WE in danger of coming to "a period in religion?" Do WE fear to go beyond the point to which "OUR father's led us?" By their work they committed us to the guidance of the written Word. To follow its teaching is safe. To commit ourselves to the Christ of the New Testament cannot be perilous. Let us study the Scriptures, and the Christ, and follow them.

James Lane Allen's new book, "The Reign of Law," published by the Mackmillan Company, New York, is a good book to read in this connection. It has a bearing on the questions here raised. It is much the best piece of work that Mr. Allen has given to the public. Read, as soon as possible, "The Reign of Law."

Christian Preachers at the Convention.

It was a marked feature that there were so many Christian preachers at the National Prohibition Convention at Chicago.

It is claimed that nearly all the Christian preachers of Illinois are prohibition voters, and it is not likely one can be found in the land who will defend his license voting in a public discussion.

The national chairman is a Christian preacher. The Illinois state chairman and the Indiana state chairman are prominent members of the Christian Church—one a doctor and the other a lawyer.

The national committee has in it two or three Christian preachers. Up-to-date preachers on the new aspects of the liquor controversy are wondering how the back-number brethren will manage to explain themselves when they see the rank and file turning away from the license system, which they are sure to do, leaving their leaders on the side of the lawless elements. I feel sorry for all preachers who have accepted as true the false and shallow claptrap on the temperance question of the day.

Even if they die in their delusion their children will have an embarrassing job of explaining how they could be Christians and perpetuationists at a time when the issue was clear-cut and single between license and nullification on one side and opposition to its aggressions upon the other.

Doctors Food Talk.

SELECTION OF FOOD ONE OF THE MOST IMPORTANT ACTS IN LIFE.

Old Dr. Hanaford, of Reading, Mass., says in the Messenger: "Our health and physical and mental happiness are so largely under our personal control that the proper selection of food should be, and is, one of the most important acts in life.

"On this subject, I may say that I know of no food equal in digestibility, and more powerful in point of nutriment, than the modern Grape Nuts, four heaping teaspoons of which is sufficient for the cereal part of a meal, and experience demonstrates that the user is perfectly nourished from one meal to another.

"I am convinced that the extensive and general use of high class foods of this character would increase the term of human life, add to the sum total of happiness and very considerably improve society in general. I am free to mention the food, for I personally know of its value."

Grape Nuts food can be used by babes in arms, or adults. It is ready cooked, can be served instantly, either cold with cream, or with hot water or hot milk poured over. All sorts of puddings and fancy dishes can be made with Grape-Nuts. The food is concentrated and very economical, for four heaping teaspoons are sufficient for the cereal part of a meal.

Chicago Letter.

The life of a man like D. L. Moody is sure to be interesting, no matter how its story is told. The Colportage Library has issued "The Shorter Life," in two volumes, making two numbers of the library, at ten cents apiece. Paul Dwight Moody and Arthur Percy Fitt are the writers. His son, W. R. Moody, is the author of the 600-page volume, sold only by subscription. Mr. Moody had a strong aversion to the circulation of portraits and biographics of himself while he lived. "It is time enough for these," he said, "when I am gone."

His early life is the old, old story of poverty and hardship. Once, when there came a severe snowstorm, the widowed mother had to keep her children in bed until school time, because there was no wood to make a fire. Young Dwight was full of fun, and especially fond of a practical joke. He once recited Mark Antony's oration over Cæsar, using a covered box to represent the coffin. It was part of the Friday afternoon school exercises. The audience was "visibly affected." Approaching the box to take a last look at Cæsar, he lifted the cover, when out jumped a tomcat! "Scat!" shouted the orator, and the tears all vanished in an uproar of laughter.

Having by a few impromptu remarks at the village lyceum changed the current of feeling on the subject under discussion, he was appointed leader of the next debate. He chose for his subject, "The Wrongs of the Indians," wrote out a ten or fifteen minutes' speech and spent days in memorizing it. When at last he appeared on the platform he recited the first few sentences and then forgot! He closed abruptly with the strange remark: "The Indians went to the North Pole and got froze up as stiff as steelyards!" The memoriter method will do for some spell-binders, but Moody never followed it. Of course he repeated some of his sermons and addresses, perhaps thousands of times, but there was often new material in them, and they never sounded like mere declamations.

One of the well-nigh incomprehensible things about Moody is that he showed no early inclinations to piety. When his mother tried to induce him to pray he said he had tried it and it didn't work. One day when about six years old a rail fence fell over on him, and he could not extricate himself, nor make any one hear his cries fer help. In his extremity he thought: "May be God will help me;" then he prayed, and he believed God heard him, for he was soon able to lift away the rails and get out. In Boston he heard the fiery, cultured eloquence of Dr. Edward N. Kirk, but it did not touch him. It is said that he chose an obscure seat in one of the galleries and, tired out with the hard work of the week, he used to sleep through most of the service. It is easy to form the habit of going to sleep in church; I've tried it when I didn't have to preach. To think that a man who stirred the multitudes afterwards as Moody did, and who became pre-eminent as a preacher and soul-winner, should have answered the simple question asked of him as a candidate for church membership as he did. "Mr. Moody, what has Jesus done for you, and for us all, that specially entitles him to our love and obedience?" The question embarrassed him. "I think he has done a good deal for all of us, but I don't think of anything in particular as I know of."

His faithful, patient Sunday-school teacher, who never lost interest in his phenomenally dull pupil, writes: "I can truly say (and in saying it I magnify the infinite grace of God as bestowed upou Mr. Moody) that I have seen few persons whose minds were spiritually darker when he came into my Sunday-school class, or one who seemed more unlikely ever to become a Christian of clear, decided views of gospel truth, still less to fill any sphere of extended public usefulness." In the face of such facts what shall we do with the poets and sages who perpetrate such sayings as: "Youth shows the man, as morning shows the day?" Was it true in this case that "the child was father of the man?"

Moody was often abrupt in speaking to men about personal religion. On his way home one night he saw a man leaning against a lamppost. Placing a hand on his shoulder he said kindly: "Are you a Christian?" The man became furiously angry, doubled up his fists and got ready to throw Moody into the gutter. "I'm very sorry to have offended you," he apologized, "but I thought I was asking a proper question." "Mind your own business," roared the fellow. "That is my busi ness," Moody sturdily replied. Three months later, about daybreak, on a bitter cold morning, some one rapped at Moody's door. "Who's there, and what do you want?" asked Mr. Moody. "I want to become a Christian," was the only reply. Moody opened the door, and to his astonishment, there stood the man who had cursed him for speaking to him about religion as he leaned against a lamppost.

Mr. Moody's success was, of course, not due to his ignorance, and he never counted it as a part of his capital stock; but it was undoubtedly due to his unconventionality, and this the culture of the schools would have taken from him. The condition of many a church and community is tersely described by Moody himself when he said of a certain city: "There is too much dignity and death in your town." A somewhat overzealous critic, who was a stranger to the firing line, once took Moody to task for his defects in speech. "You oughtn't to speak in public," he said, "your language is faulty; your grammar is very bid." "I know I make mistakes," was the reply, "and I lack a great many things; but I'm doing the best I can with what I've got. But look here, friend, you've got grammar enough; what are you doing with it for Jesus?"

The famous remark which it is said Moody once heard in the light of this wonderful life, may be changed now, and we may say: "The world his seen what God can do with and for and through and in a man who is fully and wholly consecrated to him!"

FRANK G. TYRRELL.

Macatawa, Mich.

Consecrated Followers.

B. B. Tyler's quotations from the letter of a Christian business man in the Christian-Evan-Gelist of July 5 are interesting, and so are his comments. His business man declares: "What we want is qualified, consecrated leaders." This is always a need, in religion or in politics, in commerce or in war; but does this preacher in the pew mean to intimate that we are without such leaders? Dr. Tyler's letter ought to enlighten him if this is the case; for he gives some broad hints of the consecrated courage that marks our young ministers.

From this writer's point of view our greatest need to-day is not, such leaders, but such followers. The church is usually far behind its leader in love and service. Paul's rebuke is needed. The preacher struggles against many obstacles, but the greatest and saddest is the lukewarm church to which he ministers. No doubt there are rare, sweet souls in every church, at whose feet the pastor delights to sit; but the rank and file are cold, lethargic and worldly.

In buying lots and building churches we need "qualified, consecrated" followers.

We know of no church bullding among us so costly as many private houses of individual Disciples. We know of many that are a shame and a reproach to the congregations that use them. If there were twenty per cent. of the church members living the toilsome, sacrificial life followed by at least eighty per cent. of our ministers, our numbers would not require the half of a decade to double in.

This is not written in a censorious spirit. It comes from a desire to place the emphasis where it belongs, and we believe it will find an instant echo in the hearts of thousands of our preachers. To read such a statement as that quoted, with its necessary implication that such leaders we have not, must exasperate any one familiar with the facts. No, Mr. Moneymaker, what we want is not qualified, consecrated leaders; we cannot want what we already have. What we want is qualified, consecrated followers; will you not be one? F. G. T.

Washington (D. C.) Letter.

The formal transfer of the Whitney Avenue Church property to our people was effected July 11. The story of the tender of this union chapel and the adjoining lot to the Vermont Avenue Church has been told. The only conditions imposed were that needed repairs upon the property should be made, a pastor employed and regular services maintained. The trustees agreed that if at the end of a year our administration proved a success they would deed the property to us.

A committee from the Vermont Avenue Church provided for the repairs and the C. W. B. M. employed Ira W. Kimmel as pastor. The work has been a success from the start. The church now numbers one hundred and eight and the Sunday school has an enrollment of two hundred and fifty. The young church has organized a Ladies' Aid Society, C. W. B. M., Junior and C. E. Societies and a Boys' Brigade.

The outlook was so hopeful that the National C. W. B. M. Board has decreased its apportion ment for support after one year nearly one-half.

The gift of property worth $7,000 and the establishment of the Fourth Church in the capital city should be a matter of rejoicing on the part of brethren throughout the country.

A movement has been inaugurated with a view of planting a church in Eckington, the most rapidly developing section of our city. The plan is to find some one who will give $5,000 to the Church Extension Fund on the annuity plan with the condition that it be used for the purchase of a lot in Washington. The brethren here will provide the building. The growth of the Nin h St. Church in nine years to a membership of eight hundred, the H Street Church in four years to three hundred and the Whitney Avenue in one year to more than one hundred, orings Washington prominently to the attention of those who are seeking profitable investment for the Lord's money.

F. D. Power has a habit of keeping the Vermont Avenue Church open every Sunday during the summer and taking his vacation by going out during the week to speak at assemblies and conventions and to hold protracted meetings. Our younger pastors are following this fashion and the four churches will run full blast throughout the heated term.

Elaborate preparations are being made for the Piedmont Assembly, Gordonsville, Va., July 27 to Aug. 5, and great crowds are expected. C. P. Williamson, of Atlanta, Ga., will be the chief speaker. Our Western brethren who come to the summer resorts on the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway would find the attendance upon this assembly a delightful experience.

Robert G. Frank, of Fulton, Mo., has accepted a call from the First Church, Philadelpeia, and will begin work there Oct. 1. We are glad to have such a substantail addition to our preaching force upon the Atlantic Coast.

EDWARD B. BAGBY.

An Open Letter to Parents.

As the vacation days fly quickly by, and their number is already half spent, those who have daughters to be sent from home to school are no doubt daily considering the choice of a school.

When I call your attention to Madison Institute, I believe I do you a valuable service in helping you to decide the always difficult question: "To what school shall I send my daughter?"

Madison Institute is planned for the girls who have the tastes and ambitions of students; for the girls who find real pleasure in the acquisition of knowledge—the purest, most unalloyd pleasure in life, if you will think of it—the only one that has not its concomitant pain. That we have been fairly successful in attracting this class of girls is shown by the fact that for the year just closed half the school made a general average of 90 for each of the four quarters, while a goodly number got no grade below 95; and this not because of a lax system of grading, but because the students did good work.

Our courses of study cover college entrance requirements and give two years additional. Any student who receives our diploma in either the Latin, Scientific or Modern Language Course is liberally educated and prepared to sustain herself honorably and efficiently in the work of life.

For the benefit of the girls who cannot or who will not give the necessary time to complete the Modern Language or the Latin-Scientific Course, the English Course is planned. This is a good, strong course; and is inferior to the other two only in that it requires less foreign language.

While I have said a student receiving our diploma is well educated and fitted to adorn and to serve the home, the church and society, still we believe there are a few exceptional minds that ought to have still longer and higher training. We therefore encourage such young women of means and unusual mental power and energy to go to the higher colleges. Especially young women who propose to teach should continue their education in higher colleges. For the sake of such, and for the sake of having the recognition that our work is well done, we have sought to have Madison Institute placed on the list of accredited schools of some of the leading higher institutions. Such of our pupils as so desire may enter these institutions upon certificate without the strain of the usual entrance examinations.

If, then, you should want your daughter to continue her education in one of the Eastern or Northern colleges, our certificate admits to Cornell University, Vassar College, Wellesley

Our teachers hold their degrees from the best colleges and universities of this country. They are scholarly, enthusiastic and ourseservedly devoted to the best interests of their students.

These ladies are as earnest in Christian character as they are talented and ambitious. We impress upon our students that charcter and service are the ends of all education.

We are supplied with library, well-equipped reading room, physical and chemical apparatus.

The library is freely used for reference and collateral reading by the departments of History and English.

Experimental work forms an essential part of the entire course of Science.

Many pleasant hours are passed in the reading room by students in their leisure; and here is found abundant material for reference by the Current Topics Class, ably conducted by a member of the faculty.

Our Music and Art Departments are well equipped and form an attractive feature of the school. We are provided with teachers for piano, voice and stringed instruments.

Our piano teacher is a full graduate of the Raff Conservatory in Frankfurt, Germany, and a pupil of Hans von Bulow. Our voice teacher is a pupil of Marie Bissell, known as the American Marchesi.

Our study hall has been recently furnished with handsome single desks and chairs instead of the old-fashioned seats. All the schoolrooms have been liberally supplied with Talc Plate Blackboards, with which we use natural Talc Crayon, thus freeing ourselves from all chalkdust. These improvements are conductive to health as well as comfort.

It is said by those who have had the opportunity to make comparison that Madison Institute occupies the best location for a school in our state. Dr. A. D. Mayo, of Boston, said it is the finest school location he saw on his tour of the schools of the South. It is certainly beautiful at d. healthful.

While we have all the advantages of the town, we are spared by our location its disadvantages, as publicity, noise, smoke and dust.

A large, attractive campus makes out-door life delightful, offering ample space for tennis, basket ball and other out-door sports. Our students exercise at will upon our lawn without being hampered by observation from the outside.

While we are as private as if we were in the country, we are yet very near the churches and business portion of the town. Our elevation gives us perfect drainage. The health record of the school is phenomenal. In the forty-three years of its history there has not been a death among the students or teachers. The atmosphere of the school is homelike. The very construction of the house forbids that constrained, institutional air which characterizes some schools. The greatest care is taken to make the lives of the girls free from all harm and pleasant as well as profitable. Our present capacity is for forty-five boarding students. This limit of number is a great advantage to the girls. With the principal, ten teachers and the health matron living in the house, this makes an average of about four students to each official, thus giving opportunity for much more personal care and attention to each student than is possible where large numbers are congregated. This is a most important consideration. Education, especially through the academic grades, is largely a personal matter and cannot be accomplished by the best system: and machinery applied to large

The care of the health of our girls is our first consideration. Our health matron is a trained nurse. She discharges her duties intelligently, faithfully, efficiently. It is the rule that delicate girls grow strong with us.

Madison Institute is not an experiment. She begins in September her forty-fourth session. During the past six years, under the present management, she had steadily grown in merit and in favor.

I would emphasize certain considerations which are very important in determining this school question.

1. I would emphasize the matter of locality as it affects health; because a sound, vigorous body is essential to all success. As opposed to the lower sections, which abound in malaria and nasal catarrh, I call attention to our situation at the base of the foothills of the Cumberland Mountains, free from both these enemies of good health. Our location is suburban. Our grounds contain fourteen acres. They are by nature beautiful and are kept in attractive order mainly with the view to tempting the students to much out-door life and exercise. The health conditions are vastly better for a growing girl than any city could offer.

2. I would emphasize the matter of locality as it affects conditions of study. Concentration the one secret of acquisition and retention. The simpler life of the country must always offer greater advantages to the young student than the complex life of the city with its many distrac tions. The simpler tastes of the student body must have its effect upon every individual student. It is not a matter of accident that 86 per cent. of the men who run the business and professional interests of New York City spent their youth in the country. It is the number of impressions made upon the highway that at last renders it hard and unimpressionable. Academic and preparatory work should be done apart from the distractions of the city. The dissipated energies and ineffective lives of many people are chargeable to too many distractions.

3. Our patronage comes from the best families of our own and neighboring states. Girls will meet here such girls as they will be glad to know and to retain as their friends.

I approach you on this subject, not in my own interests chiefly, but because we are prepared at Madison Institute to do excellent work for the future women of our country. Madison Institute stands for sound education, true culture and purposeful Christian womanhood.

Do not delay sending us your daughter. This is the best year. In matters of education two conditions must be regarded.

First, in order to obtain the best results, education must be begun early under the best conditions.

We urge upon parents the wisdom of sending their daughters to such a school as Madison Institute early, while their tastes are yet simple and while it is yet possible to make an impression upon them and to arouse their ambition. We want to educate girls, not to "finish" them. Often girls are kept in poorly organized schools of low standard until they are nearly grown and are then sent from home only to be discouraged by finding that they are far below the standard reached by others of their age, or their tastes are so vitiated by what is termed "society" that it is impossible to reach their minds and to arouse genuine, sincere effort.

Second, it must be continued until lasting impressions have been made. Twenty is quite young enough for a girl to graduate. While a girl is growing and forming, formation influences should continue. We have the best results with the girls that come to us at fourteen. The close attention given to the health of our girls provides against all risks at that age.

And now for that consideration which only the favored few can afford to overlook: the same combination of home comfort and schoolroom advantages cannot be found elsewhere for the same money. The charges are just what you see them in the catalogue, without any extres. $284 will pay for board, laundry, tuition and either voice or piano lessons, library and reading room fee and dispensary fee. $300 for the same and both piano and voice. We wear uniform, and the cost of dress is thereby much reduced.

Believing that the advocates of our plea cannot do the cause greater service than by aiding in securing for our school the patronage of our people and others as well, I ask your patronage and your co-operation in securing pupils for Madison Institute. You will do your friends a real service when you place them in communication with a school that aims to reach and to develop all that is best and most useful in Christian womanhood.

I hope, then, you will be glad to give the preference to a school of your own church. Our church will have taken a great step forward when the membership rallies more enthusiastically to our educational standards.

We need to endow our schools and we need to p atronize them

Madison Institute is the oldest school for girls now in operation in our brotherhood in the state. The school was established in 1856 through the efforts of prominent members of the Christian Church in Madison County, and was placed under the control of a board of twelve trustees, the majority of whom should at all times be members of the Christian Church. Eleven of the present board are active, zealous members of that church.

Madison Institute is managed and conducted by women. Since women must in the nature of the case best understand girls and their needs, this fact must be regarded as a distinct advantage.

Since forming of the character by personal association, the care of health and daily habits during this academic period are so important considerations in the education of girls, a womanly woman is a better example after which to mold the character and ideals of a girl than is a manly man. We are not ready to entirely discard the distinctly feminine element.

Our courses of study include five months' study of the Jewish Scriptures and five of the Gospels. Our girls attend Sunday-school and Sunday morning services regularly.

The Young Woman's Christian Association holds weekly prayer meetings, which are always well attended. The members of the Association have weekly Bible study and mission study classes. The earnest interest in these classes shown by the members of the Association and those who are not members is most gratifying. The members of the faculty join with the principal in earnest effort to cultivate and strengthen the spiritual lives of the students.

The points mentioned are those, it would seem, which presents this great in the selection of

The points mentioned are those, it would seem, which parents chiefly consider in the selection of a school: first, the healthfulness and desirability of the location; second, the care given to the health and home life of the girls; third, the courses of study prescribed by the institution; fourth, the strength of the faculty, and fifth, the character of the association. We feel that in all these points Madison Institute has reached a high standard of excellence standard of excellence.

Des Moines offers the best location in the West for University work. I is the business, social, political, and educational center of Iowa.

The moral and intellectual excellence of the city furnishes a wholesome atmosphere for student life. The community that has grown up around the University is in close sympathy with it. No city in the land, of its size, has larger or more prosperous churches than Des Moines. The University is in close to the community of the land. versity Place Church has the largest membership in the city.

The finishing of the new auditorium with a seating capacity of 3,500 enables Des Moines to take care of the many conventions that come here. The student has opportunity to study the leading questions of the day as presented in these conventions.

The General Assembly meets once in two years and offers fine opportunities for study and observation.

The great lecturers of the day visit Des Moines. The large auditoriums make it possible to enjoy the best talent for a minimum price. One of the best courses in the city is provided for University students in the University Place Church.

Law students have access to the District, State and Federal courts, where the ablest lawyers in the state may be heard.

The student of medicine has for teachers the leading physicians of the state, and the clinical advantages of Mercy Hospital, the largest and best equipped hospital in the state.

Mines, factories, great mercantile houses, beautiful homes, attractive parks, cultured society, a beautiful location, a city easy reached from any part of the state, a University with an established and widely recognized reputation, a student body full of the life and vigor that go with prosperity—all these factors help to make the University successful. There are students from Australia, North Carolina, Florida, Nova Scotia, Washington, Colorado and Texas. All the western states are represented.

Arkansas State Mission Notes.

The members at Helena are making an effort to obtain a lot preparatory to building. The outlook for some good work at Batesville is flattering. Bro. Jordan is well spoken of at Newport. Sister Jordan has organized a Junior with a goodly number of wide-awake boys and girls.

Mississippi county has an earnest preacher in Bro. Comter, who is trying to build up the waste places. He is doing good work.

Important that the names of all churches and preachers be sent at once, as a list will be published this summer and the census depends on the reports made by churches for religious statistics.

The Mineral Springs camp meeting, condducted by Bro. Weaver, of Texarkana, will occupy the first week in August. A profitable time is expected.

If any one in the state that wants them fails to receive the minutes of the state convention, please write for them.

E. C. BROWNING.

In New Jersey.

We started at Garwood and we have maintained the mission work all through Central New Jersey—giving Scriptures in a territory where 12 per cent. do not have it, and holding meetings in school houses, halls, vacant stores and out of doors. Last year the First Church of Christ of Plainfield, called me and I have now been in charge there for six months, occupying the pulpit morning and evening. This is in connection with the mission work. This is the only church in the state. It has a pretty, commodious and well located house of worship, and is well sustained, numbering substantial citizens among its members.

In addition, there is also another gathering in Plainfield consisting of zealous members who work effectively among the colored people and others, and have Davy Blow as pastor. These are not organized and worship with us part of the time. H. Van Middlesworth is clerk.

Omaha Notes.

The work of the Disciples of Christ in Omaha is making some progress I think. It is very slow, and I see no signs of great things just ahead. But the people begin to have an ambition to succeed and a faith to believe that what has been done in other cities can be done here. The three churches and ministers are working in perfect harmony and the evangelization of Omaha is being much talked about and planned and prayed for.

I have now been in the First Church about three months. Thirty persons have united with us, nearly all by letter. Already I have the names of about 150 who were members before coming to Omaha who seem to care little for the cause here. With the coming of the hot season our attendance is falling off, and it was small before. I have preached to the smallest audiences in Omaha I ever have had in my whole ministry. But my lot is the common lot of the ministers in the downtown districts. In the great Episcopal Cathedral here six persons turned out to morning communion last Sunday. A few weeks ago another of the largest and richest churches in the city appointed a special service for Sunday afternoon and only three persons put in an appearance.

I am told that the leading Congregational church in the city has an average of less than 100 to Sunday night meetings. And so it goes.

Our effort on Walnut Hill goes on with small results. Bro. Harlow and Miss Murphy have been preaching and singing the gospel there now for nearly four weeks with only about a dozen confessions. About twenty others have presented themselves for members if the Walnut Hills

The great insurrection in the Chinese Empire, which threatens to involve the United States and the other great nations of the world, has naturally aroused an increased interest in the "Flowery Kingdom." The American people want to know more of the situation in the Orient, and are eagerly looking for literature on the subject.

FACTS ABOUT CHINA.

We recently published a booklet, entitled "Facts About China," by Wm. Remfrey Hunt, of Chu Cheo, China. Mr. Hunt has been for many years a resident of Central China, and is thoroughly acquainted with the country and its people. The following are some of his topics:

Vastness of Chinese Empire, History and Age of China, The People of China, Populousness of China, Climate and Products, Classic and Sacred Systems, Strange Manners and Customs, Some Absurdities of Heathenism, Lauguage, Education and Literature, Missions in China.

"Facts About China" is concisely and tersely written. The purpose of the author is to convey information and to instruct and not to entertain or amuse. Nevertheless, the book is thoroughly interesting. A map of the Chinese Empire is included in the book.

church is revived. I am sure it could be if we could find a young man full of faith and wisdom and the Holy Spirit who would come to labor in that beautiful suburb without promise of a large salary. There is a fair house free of debt, and a band of earnest Disciples most anxious to succeed. If anyone with means happens to read this I wish you would send us an offering to help carry on the work in this city. The churches here are doing and will do their best, but they need outside help.

Neighborhood House.

We very much appreciate your weekly visits. The Neighborhood House of the Third Christian Church has passed the experimental stage and is a pronounced success.

The hard working people among whom we dwell would feel that something very helpful had dropped out of their lives were we to leave them, and the church would realize that a healthy channel of activity was closed up. We have a free kindergarten, a sewing school, flourishing gymnasiums for both girls and boys, just closed for the season A delive y station of the public library is well patronized and a nice reading room not very well these short evenings. Our Sunday school with its good music is well attended. Bro. Frank Davidson, a young lawyer, is our very efficient superintendent. Frequent entertainments are furnished, which are much appreciated by this intellectually starved people. We have not had preaching services, although our projected summer work includes some.

With numerous churches near who is to blame that almost a whole section of a city never go to church? I made over 50 calls last month and the almost universal answer to my question, "What church do you attend?" "We don't go to any." Is it so in your city? Truly, the harvest is still great and the laborers few.

KENTUCKY.

Newtown.-On the 13th inst. the writer closed a thirteen days' meeting with the church at Newtown, Ky., of which W. G. Walker is pastor. This is one of the historic churches of the old "Bluegrass" state, having been ministered to for nearly a third of a century by John A. Gano of blessed memory. There were 11 additions; eight by primary obedence. The season proved to be an exceedingly busy one for the farmers, their wheat and hay demanding their immediate attention. This was a very serious drawback to the meeting. But we encountered another even more serious: on Tuesday of the second week the meeting began to assume such life as to make the outlook quite encouraging, there being 10 additions that day. But the next evening the sheriff from Georgetown was on hand summoning men to act as jurors in the trial of Goebel suspects. This proved in the trial of Goebel suspects. This proved a knock-out blow to our meeting, as most of the leading men were taken, and those not caught the first evening were afraid to attend church the next day. We therefore reluctantly closed, feeling that the results were far from what they might have been under different circumstances. The writer, having baptized theastory of this church when a boy "down in Dixie," is naturally greatly interested in his labors, and invokes God's richest blessings upon pastor and flock.—Sherman B. Moore, St. Louis, Mo.

IOWA.

Weldon, July 16.—One confession yesterday. A Bro. Smit, who preaches at Woodburn Sundays and practices osteopathy here and at Van Wert, has been among us the pass two weeks. He is from Kirksville, Mo. The Seventh Day Adventists are holding a tent meeting here. They have good interest, but so far have not touched upon their peculiar belief.—J. W. CAMERON, pastor.

May the Lord bless him in his future work as in the past. - LEW D. HILL.

Anderson.-The work at the East Lynne Church, where I began labor the fourth Sunday in June, is progressing nicely and the prospects for a good work are very encouraging. We had three additions last Lord's day, two by letter and one confession. The field here is white unto harvest and with God's help we are going to try to gather them in.—R. B. GIVENS.

Irvington, July 18.—Glorious meetings at Jamestown last Sunday. One prominent M. E. lady confessed and was baptized. Also a lady 72 years old, mother of the 400 pounds man whom I baptized in February. The Sunday-school booms and everybody is happy. I can hold one meeting in August if invited now. Life Hid With Christ.

P. R. GIBSON.

(2d Col. 3:34.)

Life that is hid with Christ in God, O, joy that from his presence springs! For e'en when passing 'neath the rod My soul, secure, exultant sings: "It is thy hand that leadeth me, I trust myself, my all, to thee."

Life hid with Christ! O, blessed thought! A covert from the tempest's strife; The shadow of a towering rock In all the weary way of life; Rest for the toiling, tired feet, Beside still waters pure and sweet.

And when at last he shall appear, And we with him in glory stand, How sweet the th ught that even here We wa'ked, close clasping his dear hand, Bowed, all submissive, 'neath his r'd, And "hid our lives with Christ in God."

Dawn.

MRS. ORPHA BENNETT HOBLET.

Antoinell was dead. Up and down through the noise of the city streets, in and out of their accustomed haunts, the child wandered that day, her mind filled with this one thought.

It had seemed very unreal before. She had watched the little life burn out in the short illness, had seen the tiny form laid in the rude coffin and carted away in the chill and gray of the morning—whither she could not tell—and had felt only a vague terror and a dim sense of loss.

But when, at her master's command, she had taken her tambourine and gone out again on her daily round, the feeling grew to one of loneliness and grief. She missed the little form from her side, and clinging hand that had so often stolen into her own, the confiding glances, when she—small waif of humanity that she was—had guided the still more helpless one through dangerous ways and hurrying crowds. But more than all else she missed the sweet voice in the merry street songs, the songs that had sounded so strangely pathetic, if one but noticed the frail little singer with her old, old, baby-face.

So all day long she went with the dull pain at her heart. Sometimes, at thought of the evening meeting with her master, she struck her tambourine and essayed the familiar dances, but more often she held it, silently stretched out to the passers-by.

The afternoon grew late. She had no pennies, but worn with grief, hungry and sobbing with weariness, she dragged herself slowly homeward.

It was not far from a street of palaces, of towering and massive wholesale houses. Around a corner, down an alley, slippery with filth and full of hideous sounds, she went. Stopping at a tenement, she ascended a flight of stairs on the outs de of the building. At the first landing a door stood ajar, and for a moment she stood trembling, her hand on the latch. Then, gathering courage, she pushed the door wider and crept into the room. It was a small, dark apartment, reeking with the fumes of tobacco and liquor. At the child's entrance, a man, lying on a filthy bed in the corner, roused himself and turned a scowling, evil face toward her.

"How much?" he demanded harshly. "Gif to me."

She stretched out her empty hands and cowered almost to the floor, as with an oath he snatched up his stick. One cruel blow fell on her shoulders, then with a wild cry she broke away and rushed out of the room and down the stairs.

He followed, but only to the door; then, muttering threats and curses, went stupidly back, but the child, never looking behind, ran on in mortal terror. Through the alley and down the handsome street with the fear of an evil face and a stinging lash pursuing her she sped, her frightened eyes seeking some place of concealment. open carriage standing at the curbstone arrested her gaze, and without stopping to think she climbed into it and nestled panting and trembling under the light robe that covered the back seat and fell in ample folds over the floor. She lay for awhile rigid with fear, but gradually the tense muscles relaxed, a sense of security stole over her, she felt the softness of the robe, so grateful in its warmth and comfort, and pillowing her head on its yielding folds she fell asleep.

Nor waked when a gentleman, coming from the building before which the carriage stood, sprang into the seat in front and drove rapidly away. All through a long ride the wearied child slept, unconscious of the motion and swaying of the carriage, rather lulled by them to deeper slumber. Mile after mile she was carried, out of the city, beyond which her feet had never strayed, into the country, and finally again through streets and over pavements. Only when the quick trot of the horses ceased as they were sharply pulled up before a handsome residence did she waken. Her first bewilderment gone, she peeped cautiously forth from under her covering. It was quite dark except for the light of a distant street lamp. A gentle rain was falling and the wind blew moist and warm from the south. The gentleman on the house steps was vigorously ringing the bell.

The child stole forth from her hidingplace. Once on the ground she flitted, silent as a shadow, past the man and down the dimly lighted street. She felt as if she were walking in a dream, for this was not the city of her memory. Here were spacious lawns and fewer houses, and as she wandered farther she left streets and yards behind, straying quite out into the country.

Here was space indeed. She could not see it, but she felt it as she trudged on through the mist and dark that seemed to wrap her like a cloak, not frightened, except once, when passing a farm house, the watchdog rattled his chain and barked. She was hungry, it is true, and wet and chilled but she was also free, and liberty could not be weighed in the same balance with such everyday experiences of her life.

So on she went, sometimes swiftly, sometimes slowly, sometimes stopping to rest. Toward morning the rain ceased and the clouds broke away. The paling moon looked down upon her and the stars peeped merrily out at her. She was passing a house at the eige of a village. The yard gate stood open. Tall trees were growing within and the turf beneath them seemed to invite her weary feet. She went in and up the path, looking about her with delighted eyes on the pretty moon-lighted scene. Wearily she sank down on the doorstep. The winds came and gently lifted the curls on her forehead and sang a welcome to her in the treetops. From the play of the shadows on the lawn her gaze was drawn to the sky, just filling with the holy light of a summer's dawn. Great stars still flashed and shone there. She watched them pale before the coming of the morning until only one brave planet shone like a jewel in the whitening east. It was a revelation to this child of the slums. She waited in growing awe and wonder until the eastern sky was rose colored, then, with the song of birds and the sounds of awake-ing life all about her, her dark head drooped from weariness and she fell asleep.

Miss Hortensia McClellan was a methodical woman. "Smart," the neighbors called her, "capable" and "terrible stirrin'," but much of her successful management lay in her habits of systematic arrangement. Precisely at nine o'clock on Saturday mornings she was wont to scrub her front steps and promptly on this same morning she appeared at her door, clad in appropriate scrubbing costume and armed with broom and pail.

"The best laid schemes of mice and men Gang aft agley."

Even Miss Hortensia's were no exception, and for once her cherished steps were destined to remain unscrubbed. She caught sight of the sleeping child and, for a moment, remained speechless with surprise and indignation that her premises should have been chosen a resting-place by such a forlorn specimen of vagabondage. But recovering her presence of mind, she gave the litt e one a vigorous poke with the broom, ordering her, in no gentle accents to "wake up" and "be off."

The child awoke, confused, frightened by the forbidding face that frowned above her, by the harsh commands and threatening gestures. She started up, but worn with travel, aching in every muscle and faint for lack of food, her feet refused to carry her. She sank on the ground and lifted one of them, all bruised and bleeding, in her hands, looking appealingly at the tall figure on the steps.

Beneath the crusty exterior of Miss Hortensia's heart there still remained some depths of tenderness and these were stirred by the piteous spectacle before her.

"For the land's sake!" she ejaculated, coming swiftly down the steps. "How come your feet in sech a state? Have you come fur?"

The child nodded and Miss Hortensia's eyes behind her spectacles grew suddenly misty, as she stooped to examine more closely the cuts and bruises on the brown skin.

But she was not a woman of many words and the child suddenly felt herself lifted and borne through a long hall into a kitchen. Such a kitchen! .Spotless tables and chairs, shining tins on the shelves, curtains like snow at the windows, through which the sunlight streamed and the sweet winds blew.

She sat where Miss Hortensia placed her, looking gravely at all this glitter, while the latter bustled about, filling a tub with warm water and bringing soap and towels. Then she gingerly unfastened the child's one, torn garment. A single exclamation she permitted herself in her horror at the condition of the thin little frame beneath, and plunging her into the water, she vigorously, yet gently rubbed away the grime and filth from the poor, hurt body. She washed the matted curls and combed them out, dressed with some cooling lotion the cruel welt on her back and bound up the poor, bruised feet. Looking about for garments to clothe her, Miss Hortensia's glance fell with disgust on the filthy rags she had taken from the child, and lifting the stove lid, she thrust them into the fire.

"Wall, I have done it now," she soliloquized a moment later, "I haven't a thing fur her to put on. I guess I'll have to make her some clothes to pay fur that, an' she c'n wear this till I get 'em done."

So, taking a shawl from a hook behind the door she wrapped the little form in it, pinning its folds into some semblance of a dress

The child looked down on her peculiar costume and her great eyes filled with tears; but her mouth trembled into a smile and she took Miss Hortensia's hand in both of hers and laid her cheek against it, with a low, moaning cry of thankfulness.

Miss Hortensia opened her eyes. "There, there, child," she said, "I s'pose it does feel good to be clean an' whole dressed fur once, even in a shawl. But you're hungry, of course. I s'pose a little breakfast 'ud make you feel still better."

In a trice the breakfast appeared and the little one ate hungrily, stopping now and then to touch her cheek to the hand of her new friend with the same low cry of gratitude.

When she finished Miss Hortensia questioned her, but she could only shake her head sadly in reply.

"Wall, I give up," cried Miss Hortensia at last. "She is either furrin or dumb."

The child nodded her head and smiled. "Goodness!" ejaculated the poor woman. "I don't know what I'm to do with you. I s'pose you'll have to stay 'till I c'n make you some clothes, bein' as I burnt up all you had."

So the rest of the day the child lay on the sofa while Miss Hortensia sewed. As her swift needle pushed its way down the long seams her thoughts fiew back over her past and her grim face grew more stern as she remembered years of toil and sacrifice for a young brother and his ungrateful requital. "Yes," she thought, "she'll have to go as soon as I c'n get her off. I can't afford another experience like that."

Then her thoughts went farther back to a time when that brother had been a merry boy, and remembering the life and joy that had once filled her empty rooms and the dreary silence that now so long had reigned there, she felt her heart soften toward the little wanderer.

"It seems too bad to let her go with just the one garment,' she said, as she folded her work. "I guess I'll let her stay till I've made her a full suit. Her feet'll be well by that time. She's been a sight o' company jest a lyin' there a watchin' me. I didn't know it was so lonesome here before."

And that night she tucked the child away in a clean, white bed in a room adjoining her own.

It was almost morning; birds were twittering in the trees outs de and the dark was yielding before the day when Miss Hortensia, always a light sleeper, was wakened by movements in the house. She sat up, listening intently. The stairs creaked as if under cautious footsteps. Then came the sound of an opening door. She sprang up, her first thought of the child. Peeping into her room, she saw the bed empty and a bitter expression swept over her face as she went swiftly down the stairs.

"I might have known she'd run off," she muttered. "With my second best shawl, too. They're an ungrateful, thievin' lot, all of 'em, an' I was a fool to think any different."

The door stood ajar. Looking out Miss Hortensia saw the child sitting on the step in her queer dress, an absorbed and eager look on her face, her gaze fixed on the sky, where again was being enacted the miracle of dawn. Through all the delicious changes in the heavens she sat motionless and her watcher stood as quietly behind her. At last the sun peeped forth and the child sprang up and clapped her hands in glee; then turning, scarcely giving Miss Hortensia time to conceal herself behind the door, she passed through it and up the stairs, and some minutes later Miss Hortedsia found her fast asleep in her bed.

Many a morning the same scene was enacted, for to the amazement of all who knew Miss Hortensia the child stayed. The "full suit" was long since finished, the little feet were well and warmly clad, but the command to go never came, for the lonely woman found it "company"-this sound of childish feet in her empty rooms and the silent childish presence at her side. The house, too, lost something of its former aspect of grim order and the sun and air found access to long-darkened rooms, bringing with them the cheerfulness they only can give. The child herself lost the hunted look from her great, dark eyes, the small mouth smiled often now, among these strange delights of country life, but alas! the little body in spite of food and warmth and tender care and the almost fierce affection which Miss Hortensia came in time to lavish upon her, grew daily more frail and weak.

But to Miss Hortensia herself came the greater change. A lonely, embittered woman, caring for no one and uncared for she bad been, but now her thought, her sympathies, her whole life seemed to have broadened and one afternoon in early autumn, after kindling a fire for supper she might have been seen preparing to visit a sick neighbor.

"I'll be back right soon, child." (It was the only name she had ever called her, but how tenderly she said it.) "Don't let the kittle boil over while I'm gone."

The brown eyes promised. They watched Miss Hortensia's disappearance down the street and then returned to the fascinations of a picture book.

Some time passed when, remembering the kettle, she looked up to see stove and pipe redhot and to hear an ominous, roaring sound in the chimney. With rare presence of mind she closed the damper as she had once seen Miss Hortensia do in a similar emergency, then as the roaring died away, this old-little child went outside to assure herself that all was right.

The smoke still curled angrily, but harmlessly from the chimney, but on the low, dry roof a thin cloud of it was rising. As she watched, a tongue of flame darted out and ran along among the shingles, wavered back into smoke again, only to burst forth a moment later, larger and brighter than before.

How she ever found strength to do it, no one could imagine, but small as she was she dragged a short ladder from the shed and set it against the house. Then up she went, panting and struggling, tugging with her a pail of water which, poured over the flames, effectually quenched them. Returning to the ladder, dizzy, exhausted, her foot slipped and she fell, the ladder and bucket crashing with her to the ground.

It was morning again. The neighbors had considerately withdrawn and Miss Hortensia sat alone with the dying child, who lay motionless, her face turned to the window, watching the dawn of her last earthly day. As the sun's rays streamed above the horizon, she looked toward poor Miss Hortensia, laid her cheek once more against the toil-worn hand with the old pathetic cry of love and gratitude and then her soul sped away to the regions of eternal light.

"I will call her "Dawn," said Miss Hortensia. "She brought the morning into the dark of my life. Please God, it shall always be day." And on the simple headstone at her grave is carved the one word "Dawn."

Triumph at Last.

I know I shall come to the river side
As out of the west the dayligh fades,
And over the earth drops a silence deep,
'Mid the darkening twilight shades.
I shall hear the plash of the boatman's oar
As it cleaves the river's sullen tide,
And the boat's keel grate on the sands of time
Er. it bears my soul to the other side.

The shadows of earth will be dark and deep, And death's icy billows will fiercely roll, While Doubt and Fear, in the closing strife, Will seek to o'erwhelm my passing soul. My heart with all of its passionate strength, Will cling to the life fast ebbing away, For the chords which bind my soul to earth Will be stronger and surer that day.

When my senses loose their frail hold on life,
And I drift away on death's unknown tide,
I shall vainly seek for an anchorage sure,
For a gleam of hope from the farther side.
I must drink to the lees God's wrath 'gainst sin,
I must pass through dark Gethsemane,
Ere I can feel his strong hand at the helm
And know that his grace will succor me.

But my faith, if strong, will conquer at last,
By the blood poured out on Calvary,
When my soul shall cry from its uttermost need,
"My God, why hast Thou forsaken me?"
Up flung 'gainst the clouds that shadow the stream,
The light of heaven will greet my eyes,
For death's dark-tide is the river of life
When it touches the walls of Paradise.

Religion Makes Them Starve.

In large districts of India to-day millions of cattle could not be sold for fifty cents a head. The country, yellow and parched, has been turned into a desert by the failure of the Monsun rains. There are grass lands and fodder in other parts of India, but the poor animals are too weak to be driven to them, even if there were cattle buyers to take them away; so they die like fles, succumbing to starvation far more quickly than their owners. The thought has never occurred to the 35,000,000 Indian peasantry now suffering from hunger that the cattle would have been a food resource to tide them over the months of crop failure. They have plenty of cattle. Among all the animals of India the various breeds of horned and humped cattle hold the first MISSOURI BAPTIST SANITARIUM, 919 N. Taylor Avenue, ST. LOUIS. MO.

place. They are the draft animals in the little field of the poorest peasant. All the transportation of the inland roads depends upon them. The household that has not its own cow is in the direst poverty.

Suppose these natives, when the signs pointed unmistakably to a season of crop failure, had cured under their hot sun many thousand tons of beef by sun-drying, as jerked beef is prepared in South America: indescribable suffering and thousands of lives would have been saved; but the very idea of making such provisions as this against the horrors of famine would be inexpressibly shocking to the 150,000,000 people of India, who base their religious beliefs upon the Vedas. They would never dream of such a profanation of the teachings of Brahminism. They would rather swallow dirt and gnaw roots than eat beef, and yet they are not strict vegetarians, for all eat butter and milk, and also fish and mutton when they can procure them.

The Hindus and those who share with them their religious beliefs are just what history tells us their fathers were, three and twenty centuries ago. The highest law that concerns the Hindu is to eat correctly, and beef is one of the proscribed foods; so with this food resource in every farmyard, prized highly, as it is by most of the world, the Hindu dies of hunger rather than partake of it. These facts are perhaps as impressive an illustration as can be given of the profound influence which religious injunction and custom have upon the habits, tastes and prejudices and consequently upon the commerce of whole nations. - Cyrus C. Adams, in Ainslee's Magazine.

An Intense Question in Tense.

"What was the next station?"

"You mean what is the next station."

"No. What was is, isn't it?"

"That doesn't make any difference. Is i was, but was is not necessarily is."

"Look here; what was, is, and what was is, is. Is was is or is is was?"

"Nonsense! Was may be is. but is is not was. Is was was, but if was was is, then is isn't is or was wasn't was. If was is is, was is was, isn't it? But if is is was, then—"

"Listen: Is is, was was, and is is was and was is; therefore is was is and was is was, and if v as was is, is is, and was was was, and is is was."

Educational Influence.

It is difficult to measure the vast influence which is exerted by an institution of learning such as Hollins Institute at Hollins, Va. During its existence of more than half a century thou sands of students from all parts of the country attracted not only by its unusual facilities from an educational standpoint, but by the attractive ness of its location and its salubrious climate have received their education here and gone out of fill the various missions in life, many of them going to make up no inconsiderable portion of the faculties of our leading colleges and seminaries and many holding other positions of influence and prominence in this and other countries. Thus the principles instilled and ideas formulated during the school years at Hollins have made a lasting impress on the educational life of the country.

to fill the various missions in life, many of them going to make up no inconsiderable portion of the faculties of our leading colleges and seminaries and many holding other positions of influence and prominence in this and other countries. Thus the principles instilled and ideas formulated during the school years at Hollins have made a lasting impress on the educational life of the country. Hollins Institute was founded in 1842 and has been enlarged from time to time until its present capacity is 225 boarding pupils. It is a school for girls and young ladies, and the climatic conditions and the mineral springs (Sulphur and Chalybeate) found on the premises make it particularly conducive to their health and vigor during the period of development. The management has prepared a descriptive catalogue, which will prove exceedingly interesting to parents whe are seeking a refined home school for their daughters.

Grandpa takes the CHRISTIAN-EVAN-GELIST and I have become interested in the Advance Society and would like to become a member. I also send the name of my aunt. Miss Clara Dickinson." Bertha Underwood, Boyd, Ore.: "I have been reading the Red Box Clew and would like to join the Advance Society. I have been longing to join for some time. I will be 14 in August. I wish some of the girls would write to me. I h pe to get some of my friends to join." Myrtle Blanchard, Barnard, Mo.: "I have decided to join the Advance Society. I was a member last summer but quit when school commenced. I am 10. I study reading, spelling, geography, language, arithmetic. I am in the 5th reader. Papa and mamma are members of the Christian Church." Berla Millsap, Rookins, Mo.: "We have two pet squirrels, Dick and Polly. They are awful cunning; they will eat molasses and bread, milk, nuts and heart corn. They will just wash their faces after they get done eating and scamper all over the house. I am 13; I can plow, harrow and help papa tend the farm. I hope to be on the Honor List again in August. I had rather read the letters as to write them, so goodby." Maude Kelley, Beardsley, Minn .: "In the summer we go igooseberrying, swimming, boat riding. We live a mile and a half from the lake. The poetry I read was out of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST."

Emily Day, Sparta, Mo.: "Once when a city cousin was visiting us he and my brothers were at the barn; he said: 'I see vou boys down here in the country haven't any slang.' My seven-year-old brother said: 'No, but if we had a string we could make one, for there are plenty of old boot-tops around.' I have read In His Steps and like it real well, and have reread Underfoot; it is a good book for children to read." Myrtie Searcy, Farmingdale, Ill.: "We have started a Sunday-school about half a mile from our house. I get to go nearly every Sunday. I went to a good many funerals this spring. Let me know if my report is all right." (It is right; you have kept the five resolutions.) Everett Babb, Buffalo, Mo.: "The Advance Society here is very small, with only one member; that is myself."

Martha Lorena Upton has read Miss Herbert's Keys, and Netty and Her Sister. Mary Edna Long has a new piano and is taking lessons and learning to play. Myrtie Searcy sent me in her letter some beautiful flowers, which I appreciated very much, and from Julia Cox I have received her photograph, which I am glad to place among my collection. Melvin Ledden (Ospur, Ill.,) is reading Uncle Tom's Cabin; he has read Robinson Crusce. He is nine. Mrs. Mattie Dever and her son, Gerald, read Looking Backward this quarter. Alta Millsap was "delighted with the Red Box Clew." She likes to read letters from California, for she has a sister who lives there.

Young people, please take notice that I no longer live in Plattsburg. I have moved to Albany, Mo., where I am going to teach in the Central Christian College, and where I would be delighted for all of you to come and go to school and study Latin and Trigonometry and nice things like that. When you write be sure and address your letters to this place, because the postmaster at Plattsburg will get tired of forwarding my letters, for he is a busy man and a Republican, so it will take much of his extra time a-trying to get Mr. McKinley re-elected. This is not the place for me to say whether I am for Mr. McKinley or Mr. Bryan; same are for one and some for another, and a lot of people think it makes a great deal of difference, but you'll find that whoever's elected you'll only get five sticks of peanut candy for a nickel, unless, of course, the candy man is kin of yours. We will have four more weeks of the "The Lion's Sister," and then I will begin a continued story of my own. I am writing on it now, trying to get it ready just as soon as the other one is ended. So if you don't think much of the one now running by Mr. Thackeray, perhaps you may care more for the next story by me. It is about five girls and what they did and said, with a boy in it and a young man. They go to school and have adventures, and there is a mystery in it as dark as my hat. I think it will be as long as the Red Box Clew, but I can't tell yet if it will be as good, since I haven't written much of the story. But what there is is good.

EDUCATIONAL ADVANTAGES OF THE LEADING UNI-VERSITIES FOR YOUNG WOMEN.

One of the foremost educational institutions for young women is the Mary Baldwin Seminary, Staunton, Va. It is conducted on the university plan, with a great faculty of American and European teachers presiding over various "schools" of language, literature, art, music, science and commerce. The principal is a woman of a courtly grace who surrounds each pupil with or a courtry grace who surrounds each pupil with the refinement of a charming home life, in addition to the except onal educational advantages of the study halls. What Jefferson's University of Virginia has been to the men of the South and East, the Mary Baldwin Seminary has been to its women. During the sessions just closed 220 students from twenty source states were appelled. students from twenty seven states were enrolled, and it is more than likely that the increase in the coming year will be very great. A beautifully illustrated catalogue is sent to persons interested.

JESUS AND THE CHILDREN.*

The transfiguration scene was followed by one whose contrast has demanded the brush of the artist and the pen of the ready writer to set it forth in living colors. From the glory of the mountain top with is shining radiance and its heavenly voices Jesus and the three disciples descend into the valley where a noisy multitude are disputing over the sad affliction of a poor demoniac. For some reason the nine disciples who were left behind by the Master had failed in their attempt to expel his evil spirit. Perhaps what Jesus had said about his approaching death at Jerusalem had for the time weakened their faith in him. More probably, as appears from Mark 9:29, they had been neglecting their daily prayers, and thus they were incapacitated for doing the work to which they were called. Rebuking the lack of faith so manifest on the part of the whole company, Jesus heals the poor boy and then takes his way again to Capernaum. Here occurred the remarkable miracle in which Jesus sends Peter to the lake to catch a fish in whose mouth he promises him he shall find a shekel. With this he is to pay the temple tax for both of them. Unique as this miracle is, even among the mighty works of Jesus, it can offer no difficulty to the believer in the Savior's true divinity. He who could multiply the loaves and fishes, convert the water into wine, still the winds and waves and call the dead forth from the tomb would find it no hard task to create a coin in the fish's mouth. If we have the faith of a little child we will take the story as the evangelist has given it to us.

On their way from Cæsarea Philippi to Capernaum the twelve had been disputing as to their respective places in the coming kingdom of the Messiah. We might have supposed that what Jesus had said regarding his approaching death would remove from their minds the false views they had held about the kingdom. But lifelong prejudices are difficult to overcome, and the carnal view of the Messiah's reign had wrought itself into the mental texture of the nation until nothing but the lesson of experience itself would eradicate it. Not until after the death and resurrection of Jesus-nay, not till the descent of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost did the disciples understand that Jesus' kingdom was not of this world.

It is likely that the favor shown to the three disciples in being permitted to behold the transfiguration of Christ had somewhat to do with this dispute for precedence. A little latter we find two of these disciples, James and John, with their mother, asking for the first places in the kingdom, and they may have based their claim, in part at least, upon the seeming partiality which had been shown them. The other disciples, on their part, would probably view with jealousy the distinction accorded to the three and resent what might seem to them an attempt to assume the honors of the apostolic group.

Jesus took no open notice of th's dispute till they were seated again in the familiar home of Peter in Capernaum. Then, as Mark tell us, he asked them what was the subject of their dis-They were too ashamed to answer at first, but when they perceived that Jesus had read their hearts, they confessed that the question of who should be greatest in the kingdom of heaven was the one over which they had disputed. the Master gave them an object-lesson whose beauty and power have been recognized as unequaled in all human history. He called a little child unto him and taking him lovingly in his arms told them than to become like this little child was to be truly great.

They must be humble like the child. "God chooses not the lion, but the lamb; not the eagle, but the dove; not the cedar, but the vine; not the thunder, but the still, small voice" to serve as symbols of his redeeming and revealing grace. The child is content to be less than those who are over him if only they will love him. Unholy ambition is the bare of church and state. Who shall be greatest? is the source of much that is evil in politics, society and religion. Not to think of oneself more highly than one ought to think is a much-needed lesson for to-day.

They must be trustful like the child. Without faith it is impossible to please God. We walk by faith, not by sight. A sceptical child would be a spiritual monstrosity. Children instinctively believe. The faith of little children in God and Christ is the most beautiful thing on the earth. Woe be unto him who disturbs their simple trust and sows the tares of doubt in their young minds. Jesus says that it would be better for that man to have died an awful death than to have slain the faith of a child. And he who gives occasion for stumbling to one of these children that believe in Jesus has wrought an irreparable wrong. Better had he cut off his hand or foot, or plucked out his eye, if thereby he had escaped the temptation which has first wrecked his own soul and has then proven a snare to innocent childhood. It is possible that in this passage Jesus is speaking of Christian believers in general under the figure of little children, but I prefer to believe that he is speaking of the little ones like that one which he had already used as an object-lesson-tender hearts which were old enough to receive the simple truth of God and strong enough to follow the Master if they were helped and not hindered by those who were older. Samuel, who heard God's voice so early and so faithfully, obeyed; Josiah whose childish heart turned to the Lord from the vanities of the royal court around him; Timothy who from a babe had been familiar with the holy Scriptures-these are the prophecies of a host of believers who in early life have given their hearts to Christ in intelligent and lifelong faith and service. Alas that parents should so often be stumblingblocks in their children's way instead of helpers of their faith! Alas that fathers and mothers should discourage the desire of their children to become Christians and compel them to wait till in many instances the ungranted desire is lost and the heart is hardened against the sweet gospel of Christ!

"See that ye despise not one of these little ones; for I say unto you, that in heaven their angels do always behold the face of my Father weich is in heaven." How sacred is childhood, how holy the little child. God, who sends an angel to the exhausted prophet Elijah in the wilderness; who surrounds with his hosts the beleaguered city where his servant, Elisha, is; who dispatches a company of angelic messengers to take to the shepherds the tidings of the new-born Redeemer; who comforts after his temptation and strengthers in his agony his own beloved Son by the hands of an angel; who by the same means shows to his aged servant, John, the vision of the shows to his aged servant, John, the vision of the triumphant and glori us church—this same God has angel messengers through whom he ministers to the little ones, and they are not inferior ones either, for they do always stand before the very face of God. Let the little children lift their voices and hearts in praise, for they have a loving Father in heaven and a Savior who holds them in his heart of love. Let us tell often to our children the s ory of divine grace, and let us send it to the children afar off in the abodes of darkness till the little ones everywhere shall lift their faces to the sky in simple faith and affection, and child-hood be redeemed from sin and sorrow.

THE EVIL OF ENVY.

(Luke 15:25-32.)

There is, perhaps, no sin to which most of us re more given. In some degree it must at one me or another assault the hearts of all. It arises

First, a consciousness of our own shortcoming. Ve see given to some other some recognition that not given to ourselves, that we are not worthy f, and this consciousness of ours leads to an unontrollable desire for similar recognition. Or we ee some other possessing a virtue we cannot comhand, and instead of the gratification we ought to eel in another's worth we are surprised to find uselves looking askance and detracting. Happy e we if we can root out the evil.

Second, envy may arise from a desire to pass or what we are not. We see the store that is set v the world upon certain achievements or possesions, and we so earnestly long for these things nd the esteem in which they are held that we ould be glad to be considered their possessors, hether we are or not. And yet, how foolish this ! When we reduce the matter to its last analysis e are justly shocked that any one should ever wish be accounted what he is not. Surely, it is a false

Again, all the springs of envy may be summed p in the one word, selfinness. An unwarranted onsciouscess of self and the desire for selfish gratication leads us to be ungenerous to others and to ish them less than they possess. What more ngracious figure is there than the elder brother the parable of the Prodigal Son, as he stands part angry and sulking and refusing to make art in the feast!

Many a battle has been lost because of the envy f some officer toward a chieftain. Many a naonal purpose has gone to wreck on the rock of avy among statesmen. Many a church has been uined because church officials were not large nough to overcome this wretched little feeling. lany a worthy enterprise of all sorts has been lasted because of this most foolish of all sins, beause somebody who wasn't placed at the head ulked and sat without and refused to come in.

Is not the world large enough and life full nough of opportunity and achievement to give ach of us ample scope for effort and honor withut our seeking to take away from the honor of thers? We need not feel that the whole world is ooking at us, or that the universe rests upon our houlders. The Lord has given us much to do, but e has not given it all to any one of us. And if re imagine that we are the whole enterprise, we hall be doomed to some such disappointment as he elder brother and made to occupy our rightful lace.

To correct envy we should-

First, find what we are good for, and limiting urselves to that, work hard and be satisfied with hatever success we may attain, always striving on. Second, learn to appreciate how much the world in need of beautiful living and honorable achieveents, and therefore to rejoice whenever anybody dds to the sum of the world's brightness and Third, crucify self and love mankind.

Fourth, realize that we are not our own, but ought with a price, and it is ours to add in every ossible way to the glory of Christ's kingdom, and ot to our own glory.

The Acme.... Smelting and Refining Company

Offers to Investors for a Short Time Unequaled Advantages.

IT IS A WELL-KNOWN FACT

That a custom smelter, properly equipped and operated, is the most certain source of revenue in the mining business

ITS SUCCESS

Is not contingent upon the output of any one mine or group of mines, but draws its support from a large number of mines in the district where it is located. There are 100 producing and paying mines within a convenient distance of our smelter site and at least 200 more would be developed if there was a custom smelter conveniently located to which ore could be shipped for treatment.

A CUSTOM SMELTER

Bears the same relation to mining that agrist mill does to an agricultural district, with the profits greatly in favor of a custom smelter. The usual net profits of a custom smelter are about $3.00 per ton.

WE HAVE GIVEN YEARS

Of careful study to our plans and know that we are warranted in our undertaking—the erection of a custom smelting plant. Risks which exist in all ordinary mining operations have been carefully eliminated from our plans. We have water, fluxes, an inexhaustible supply of ore and a clear field.

WE CONTRACT NO DEBTS. OUR MOTTO IS: CASH or NOTHING.

A CUSTOM SMELTER HAS THESE ADVANTAGES OVER ALL KINDS OF COMMERCIAL BUSINESS:

- The product of a smelter invariably sells for cash.
- The ore smelted is ample security for the expense of smelting.
- 3. Profits are always large, often reaching 50 per cent. annually on the par value of the stock.
- 4. Charges for smelting are always collected before the "matte" or refined ore is delivered from the
 - 5. A custom smelter has no bad debts.
 - 6. A gold smelter's out-put never fluctuates in value.
- A gold smelter is absolutely independent of any financial stringency, business stagnation, politica disturbance, or other calamity which jeopardizes all ordinary classes of investments.

Our Board of Directors is a Guarantee of Safety to all Investors. -It is composed of

HON. C. C. COLE, Late Chief Justice of Iowa.

 The Board of Directors are all men of high moral and business standing.

The par value of the stock is $1.00 per share.

For a short time we are offering a limited amount of stock at 50 cents a share-one-half payable in cash, and balance in five equal monthly installments, or where the entire amount is paid in one payment 45 cents a share. Stock is issued full paid and non-assessable. Most respectfully,

Literature

I have just read "Public and Private Rights,"* by W. W. Hopkins, at one sitting. It is a most commendable book for many reasons. It is intensely interesting and thoughtful; it is written in well-selected English; its subject-matter is specific and exceptionally lucid and convincing; its attitude is most refreshing and stimulating, in that it points out evil and dire results if certain tendencies are not overcome, but it holds that they will be overcome and seeks to point out the remedy; its fairness is seldom seen. It possesses the very rare feature of great plainness and steadfastness along reform lines without assuming infallibility or employing vituperative abuse. It should be widely read. It is timely, thoughtprovoking, and will do much good.

SHERMAN HILL.

Sarah Truslon Dickinson has given to the public a most acceptable book from the sermons, addresses and writings of Rev. Lyman Abbott. D. D. The title of this book of over 300 pages is "Problems of Life," and the selections are classified under headings embodying the uppermost topics and issues of the day. The selections are not only gems of thought from a literary view, but they are vigorous in their defense of righteousness and the condemnation of evil regardless of surroundings. The selections touch upon a wide range of subjects and present some of the most advanced thoughts of the age upon living national questions. It is an excellent book for the preacher's library. Address Dodd, Mead & Co., New York.

There is a new book just out on the "Trust Problem," by Jeremiah W. Jenks, Ph. D., Frofessor Political Science, Cornell University, and from the press of McClure, Phillips & Co., New York. As the present presidential campaign will involve the trust problem the book has the promise of a wide field in appearing at such a time.

All men who believe the Bible to be an inspired book have by no means accepted the common theory concerning the time of Christ's death. There are those who believe, and not without much evidence, that Jesus was crucified earlier in the week than on Friday, and one of the strongest arguments in support of this theory is contained in a book recently given to the public entitled "Three Prophetic Days." The book contains 230 pages and may be had for 30 cents by addressing "Three Prophetic Days," Clyde, Ohio.

"The Coming Democracy," by Orlando J. Smith. is a book that deals with the defects of our present system of government and their remedies. It deals with fundamental principles and historic facts. It is not a partisan document, but a frankand open treatment of our government in the light of its weaknesses. One especially interesting feature of the book is the new form of government for our cities suggested; also the "free man's ballot" and the balloting system. With such light as is now being thrown upon our great questions by thinking men and women, the evils of which we complain cannot endure. They will either disappear or be greatly modified. The world must go forward. Address The Brandur Co., New York, for the book. Price, $1.00. Paper, 50 cents.

Our First Congress.

A neat little volume, product of the Christian Publishing Comany, lies before me, in which I have been refreshing my mind regarding some of the addresses delivered at "Our First Congress." The book is neatly printed and bound, convenient to handle, easy for the eye. It is to be hoped that with the recently added stimulus to book publishing, as seen in the productions at St. Louis, there will be also an added stimulus to the making of such literature as will ever be a credit to our people.

The opening essay in the book is the vir le address of Professor E. S. Ames, "The Value of Theology." In it is clearly set forth the only sane position, that, eschew theology as we may, we nevertheless have a theology. Willy nilly, it it is there. We cannot think without postulating God; and postulating God, we lay the foundations for theology. The only man who has no theology is the man who has no God, and that man's name, says some one, is Fool. Even Herbert Spencer, who declares we can know nothing of God, yet has his theology, for he declares an attribute of God, viz., unknowableness. It is as reasonable to say: "I'll draw my circle without a center; I'll build my square without enclosing space" as to say: "I'll do my religious thinking, or any thinking, without a theology." Mr. Ames strengthens his position with lucid paragraphs.

"The Cry: 'Back to Christ,' comes in for able treatment by such men as J. J. Haley, J. B. Briney, W. J. Lhamon, who naturally show us the varied standpoints from which that cry, so thrilling in Christendom, a new crusade, may be inter-

"Crucial Points Concerning the Holy Spirft," is dealt with by R. T. Mathews, W. E. Ellis and F. N. Calvin. This is a topic of most difficult and delicate character and takes a blade of the keenest and finest Damascus make to find joints and marrow. Perhaps there is no theme that has been more abused and mishandled, concerning which a greater amount of confused and confusing balderdash has been said and printed. It is worth one's while to find occasionally a clear head and heart to deal with it. Not all that is said in these essays can be endorsed, but stimulus is there.

Allan B. Philputt, one of the coolest, most judicious, practical men of the Reformation, whose handling of large churches is well known among us, takes up the difficult task of dealing with "Organization and Its Adjustment to the Present Needs of the Church." There is no more important problem before our people to-day, none that presses more for solution. His paper is ably reviewed by another successful pastor, W. F. Richardson.

The matter of church services, "The Enrichment of Public Worship Among the Disciples," is handled by one of such refinement and culture as to deal faithfully by such a topic—Ida Withers Harrison, of Lexington, Ky. In the matter of a more moving church service, that shall stir us to a deeper worship, there is much to be learned among us. The choice of hymns, the preparation of prayer, the creation of an atmosphere in which neither the jarring of crudities nor the babbling of set forms shall offend, is a matter in which all of the non-ritualistic churches may go to school. Mrs. Harrison is competent to give advice to pastors in these matters from the view-point of the cultivated pew.

The entire book is worth putting on the shelves by the side of "The Old Faith Restated," and other volumes of reference, for days of need.

Hardin College, Mexico, Missouri, was founded in 1873 by Charles H. Hardin, afterwards governor of Missour., for the purpose of "providing for girls as good educational advantages as now exist for boys." The growth of the college has been steady. The enrollment, 1898-1899, was 254. The endowment of the college increases gradually. The founder provided that 40 per cent. of the interest accruing on the endowment should be added annually to the principal till the sum reached $500,000. He also provided that no debt should ever be incurred on the college property. The college is thus put on a sound basis. Parties feeling moved to put funds into the cause of education would not give amiss by giving to Hardin College. Excellent work is done in English, Latin, Greek, the modern Languages Mathematics, Psychology, Ethics, the Bible History and Political Economy. CLINE

Elizabeth Linn was the fourth of eight daughters of Judge John Linn, of Monroe county, Ohio, and was born May 1, 1808, just southwest of where the town of Bealsville now stands, and was the first white female born in the settlement. So scarce was help that her father went to the mouth of Sunfish, swam the Ohio and with the nurse returned, both using the horse for a ferry-boat. John Linn left Hagerstown, Md., in 1800, with a young wife, ree Sarah Powell, and their first born for the territory of Ohio, and settled on

Salt Run, opposite Wheeling, W. Va., and remained their until 1807, when they went to their new home. She recollected well the war of 1812 and the first wagon that ever came to their place. Many wild Indians and wild beasts roamed the forest. In 1826 she was married to Jacob Thomas, of Captina Creek. In September, 1827, Thomas, of Captina Creek. In September, 1827, she was immersed by John Secrest, late of Owen county, Ind., and was at the house of Geo. Gates when he and Alexander Campbell separated. In 1834 the family moved to the Little Muskingum, 20 miles from Marietta. Of her marriage came seven sons and three daughters, four of whom survive her: Lcvi, the eldest, in Washington county, Ohio; Isaac, at Elkhart, Col; B. F. and Mrs. S. B. Moore, of Moberly, Mo. Jacob Thomas died March 19, 1850 In August, 1850, she was married to David Cline, four miles from Ray's Landing on the Ohio. About 1860 they moved to Landing on the Ohio. About 1860 they moved to Marietta and was there during the war between the states, where she was then and afterwards known as "Grandma Cline." Their house was just west of the Elevated Square and opposite Camp Tupper, whence thousands marched away never to return. In the winter of 1861 and 1862 her house was used for a hospital. She had three sons and five stepsons in the Union army, and many relatives and friends who found welcome hospitality under her roof. In 1865 they moved to Brown county, Ind. Mr. Cline died in 1871 and in 1874 she moved to Exira, Ia., to live with her children. In 1887 she moved to Northwest Nebraska and remain d there until 1899, when she came to Greenfield, Mo., where she departed this life April 27, 1900, at the age of 92, at the home of the writer. Few people have seen so great a charge and very few have performed a more nobl. part. Always strong "and never wanted to be pitied," and willing to feed the hungry, to clothe the destitute and shelter the homeless. Her home was a welcome abode for the Christian-Evangelist. A New Railroad to San Francisco.

The newly completed extension of the Santa Fe Route through the San Joaquin Valley to San Francisco was opened for passenger business on July 1, 1900

The Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway has heretofore rossessed the distinction of being the only line with its own track and trains all the way from Chi ago to Los Angeles and San Diego. San Francisco and the important cities of the San Joaquin Valley are now added to the vast territory served by this great transportation system under one management, which territory also includes a large part of the region between Denver on the north, and Galveston on the south.

Stress is laid upon single ownership and man agement, which insure uniform excellence of service. Overland trains by this route do not miss connection, because they run through. The eating-house and dining-car service is of the same superior quality throughout, under mamagement of Mr. Fred Harvey. The best equipment is pro-vided. Employes are everywhere solicitous and courteous. Responsibility for the comfort of passengers is not divided.

No other transcontinental route offers so great number of attractions to the tourist. Among these are mountain altitude and scenery, extinct volcanos, petrified forests, prehistoric ruins, Indian pueblos, the Yosemite, and the Grand Canon of Arizona, which is the greatest scenic wonder of the world. Every characteristic phase of industrial life in the West is traversed en

The Santa Fe has long been the favorite route between the East and Southern California. By virtue of the same high-grade service and unexcelled attractions it hopes to win equal favor with travelers to and from San Francisco and intermediate cities of the Golden State.

The service will consist at first of Pullman and tourist sleepers and chair cars daily. The early resumption of the California Limited is contem-

Kansas City Letter.

The great Democratic Convention lives with us now simply as a reprospect. Only a few days ago and it was fascinatingly alive, but the hosts are gone, the flags no longer wave, the music has clean died away. Thus do all earthly pageants pass. But memories of the spectacle pulse still, and refusing to accept the time quietus, insistently linger. And these memories, having detached themselves from all partisanship, and having cleared the bogs of sectarianism may be more or less worthy of our coddling.

First of all, the splendid hall in which the convention met rises up before us and the interest of its story. It opens our eyes quite wide indeed to be told that this superb hall, admittedly the finest of its kind on the continent, was built in less than three months. When the former hall, tragically short-lived, went up in smoke in April, few were there outside the daring, who said that "it must be," who believed it possible that it could be replaced in time for the housing of the expected convention. Doubt and dismay were written everywhere save upon the faces and hearts of this dauntless few. The impossible was not only attempted, but accomplished. Civic enterprise and grit, oneness of aim and endeavor, wrought the miracle, and through work by night and day the hall was made ready. And what a glorious auditorium! How superbly would it house a great convention of the Disciples twenty thousand strong!

To the average onlooker the interest was chiefly in the spectacular features of the convention, and as a spectacle pure and simple it was pronounced by all convention-goers as the most magnificent in the history of political conventions. This feature was enjoyed by both Democrats and Republicans alike, and in the extension of hospitality, the proffer of courtesies, the wideness of welcome, no party lines were drawn. Kansas Citv was hostess, and the political complexion of the meeting was entirely ignored. This was a graceful civic act and was most warmly appreciated by the visiting throngs.

One could but lament all the while that some small measure of the enthusiasm displayed on that occasion should not characterize our Christian work. This enthusiasm, at times forced and prolonged by shrewd manipulation, was at other times, notably at the reading of the party platform and the mention of Mr. Bryan's name at the close of Chairman Richardson's address, spontaneous, electrifying, savagely exultant, of a fierce wildness and uncontrollableness like the roar and flame of a forest fire. It was all-embracing. No soul could stand before it. Moveless, impassive, phelegmatic men, like Croker and Hill, immunes to enthusiasm, one would think, were caught upon these great fire-waves and swept resistlessly onward with the throng. The psychology of the matter is of curious interest.

Given but a tithe of this volcanic fervor, this flame-red enthusiasm, and the church would go forth to countless victories. Who is there who would underrate the power of sentiment? Let such sceptic note how that all calculations and sober reckonings and logic-conclusions and reasondogmatic are swept aside by the mighty rush of a wave of fire

We are having much nowadays, too, about the decline of the platform. The type we hear has murdered the voice. Let the press speak! Let the lips be silent! Small comfort would such conclusions get from a convention. The orator is still supreme. . Men want still to see and hear a man. The world wants to read, but it wants also to listen. The voice is now as ever the instrument of passion. Men may be convinced by a paper, a book; they are moved by the voice of an earnest man. The orator is still supreme. As at the Philadelphia, so also at the Kansas City Convention, the addresses waked tumultuous applause. Twenty thousand souls as responsive to a speaker's words as the harvestfields to the breeze is a marvel worth going many miles to see. The interest in the address by Mr. Webster Davis, in which he announced his allegiance to his party and in an impassioned way plead the cause of the Boers, was little short of the painful in its intensity. And so throughout the whole of the convention the orator was pedestaled in power.

Are we not giving ourselves over to hero-worship-we Americans? Mr. Roosevelt, passing through our city during the convention, was met by thousands of admirers and cheers for the hero of San Juan made the welkin ring. A little later in the great hall the bare mention of the name of the Nebraskan brought twenty thousand men and women to their feet and precipitated a carnival of spectacularity lasting for nearly one-balf hour, during which, in delicious whirl of unreason, caps were thrown in the air, flags worn to threads, banners brought to ruin through frantic wavings and vocalizations run riot, rushed through the whole gamut of frenzied notes. Are we not heroworshipers? Oh, no; we are cool, culculating Americans, quite averse to excitement-enthusiasm-so we say.

Our convention, this October-shall it share in the splendid enthusiasm of the political conventions? Our cause is nobler, our aims are higher, our work is more important-shall we bring to it other than words and hearts of fire? Let us make of it a great convention-great not merely in numbers but in its endeavors and accomplishments. Let it be a memorable convention, so that in years to come we shall look proudly upon this and that ministry and say: "It was begun in our convention in Kansas City many years ago." The young city by the Kaw extends cordial greetings to all. Let the hos's gather.

Convention Spurs.

I see by the papers that there is going-July 4th is past-to be a great convention at Kansas City this fall and it seems that many are going. Brethren, let me ask, do you really mean it? Will you practice what you ppeach and go? Why do I ask these questions? Let me explain.

Before going to the Cincinnati Convention, last fall. I concluded to take lodging over in Covington. Ky. In compliance with the request of the committee I wrote to them my desire and I was assigned to the home of a good Presbyterian lady.

This lady having been informed of the 'great" number (?) that were coming to her home, made ready for the coming guests. Notwithstanding the fact that her large and well-arranged dwelling was pretty numerously bedded, she knew from reports received that she would need more beds. This she did and made ready.

Twenty had written the committee and her that they were coming and -and what? Only one

Say, some of you who wrote that good lady that you would be there, go over and convince her that the "Christian Church" is the church and that immersion is the only mode of baptism and in order to the washing away of sins. Go and convince her that the Presbyterian Church is wrong in respect to total depravity or original sin.

Brethren, "such things ought not to be." That lady is more averse to the Christian Church today than 10 months ago, and why? Perchance you know.

I told the good lady that the committee was not to blame, but that the blame rested on those who promised to come and did not.

Another thing: You wronged the committee when you failed to go and take the lodging they so kindly arranged for you.

If we say we're going to Kansas City and write the committee accordingly, for the sake of the cause, the conversion of others and our veracity, let us go. Let actions speak louder than words. "Not every one that sayeth" "I am going to Kansas City this fall," but he that goeth shall be there.

And we'll have another grand time. O. D. MAPLE.

The Teacher or Student who is in possession of a copy of this Journal will find himself or herself so fully equipped that no other lesson help will be required.

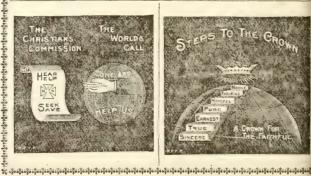

2. PRIMARY HELPS.— The Helps and Hints for Primary Teachers, prepared by Mrs. Mary Wisdom

Grant, the foremost Primary Teacher and Writer of the Christian Church, leave nothing further to be desired along this line. They are full, simple and practical, often accompanied by pictures and blackboard designs such as the ordinary teacher can reproduce, and such as the little ones can understand. The Primary Teacher's work is the most difficult of all work attempted in the School. Many who can teach successfully in other departments of the school prove failures in the presence of the little people, as to successfully lead and interest them requires special talent and equipment. Therefore the teachers of these classes ought to have the best help obtainable, and such help it is the province of Our Young Folks to supply.

Specimen Blackboard Designs.

The Blackboard is a most useful device in the hands of a compete superintendent for bringing out the lesson truths and fixing them upon t minds of the pupils. Our Young Folks gives special attention to this feature giving a great variety of designs which can readily be reproduced on t Blackboard in cularged form. The above are fair samples of the careful prepared designs that have appeared in the columns of the paper in this copartment, accompanied by suggestions as to the best way to use them in co ducting the Review. In the department of "Helps for Primary Teacher there are also frequently designs that are very suggestive and helpful. Sup intendents should all avail themselves of the help this feature of the par

CURRENT EVENTS.

News from South Africa during the past week has not been as assuring and pleasing to England as she had hoped. Baden-Powell, the hero of Mafeking, is again beseiged at Rustenburg in Western Transvaal. General Hickman was sent to his relief but his force was inadequate and he was compelled to return to Pretoria. General Roberts was also endeavoring to capture General Botha and his army, but failed and returned to Pretoria. If he had any engagement with the enemy it is not yet reported. General Hunter's casualties in forcing Relief's Nek are placed at one hundred. General Roberts also says that only one train was captured on the night of July 21st, between Kroonstad and the Vaal, and that it contained supplies, two officers and one hundred men of the Welsh Fusileers. It is reported that General De Wet is surcounded at Klerksdorp, but this wily Boer has been reported surrounded so often that there is little comfort to England in the report. It seems that the war in the Transvaal has, therefore, come to a standstill intil General Roberts can plan another campaign.

Since writing the above news from Gen. Roberts, later word says that Gen. Prinslow and five thousand Boers have surrendered unconditionally to Gen. Hunter at Naauwport Nek. This embraces a number of commandos and will greatly weaken the Boer resistance in the Transvaal. It now remains for Gen. Roberts to relieve Baden-Powell at Rustenburg in the Western Transvaal and to surround and capture Gen. Botha and President Kruger in the eastern part of that state, and the work of subjugating the Boers will then have been accomplished; at least the overthrow of their republic.

King Humbert, the king of Italy, was assassinated on last Sunday evening by Angelo Bressi, an anarchist, of Prato, Tuscany. The report says that the king had been attending a distribution of prizes in connection with gymnastic competition and had just entered his carriage with his Aidede-Camp amid the cheers of the crowd when he was struck by three revolver shots fired n quick succession. The assassin was immediately arrested. King Humbert was born March 14, 1844, married Princess Margherita, of Savoy, April 22, 1868, and on January 9, 1878, at the death of his ather, became the king of Italy. He ascended the throne of Italy at the age of 33 and has ruled his people with rare skill.

One of his first acts was to grant an amnesty pardoning all political offenders and runaways from conscriptions, commuting all sentences of death and diminishing all other imprisonments six months. Other attempts have been made upon his life, but from these he escaped unharmed. He is said to have been a man of fine appearance and was greatly loved by his people.

Although born in Tuscany, the assassin of King Humbert was recently from Paterson, N. J., where he has a wife. He had not been in America a great while and left Paterson about the middle of July for Milan, Italy, for the purpose of committing this awful deed. It is said that there is a society of anarchists in Paterson. It is also said that his wife knew nothing of the object of his trip to Italy and was prostrated when told of her husband's crime. The assassination of the King of Italy by Bressi seems to have had no other motive than that he was carrying out the principles of the society of which he was a member. The sudden death of the King is said to have greatly encouraged the republicans and tneir allies in Italy and a revolution is feared. King Humbert's body will be taken to Rome, where it will lie in state, and from which place the royal funeral will occur. The Pope was greatly grieved at the news of the assassination; the Queen was overwhelmed with grief and all Europe mourns his untimely death. The new King Victor Emmanuel Ferdinand was immediately placed in power and the Italian Parliament summoned to convene immediately after the funeral of the late King.

The anxiety of the Christian world concerning the fate of the foreigners in Pekin has been relieved in part by what has been accepted as an authentic message from Sir Claude MacDonald, the British Minister. The dispatch is dated in Pekin, July 21st, and is in cipher, and to his government, and reads as follows:

To July 16, repeatedly attacked by Chinese troops on all sides. Both rifle and artillery fire. Since July 16, an armistice, but a cordon is strictly drawn on both sides of the position. Chinese barricades close to ours.

All women and children in the British legation. Casualties to date, sixty-two killed, including Captain Strouts. A number of wounded in hospital, including Captain Halliday. Rest of legation all well except David Oliphant and Warren, killed

The German Government has also received a dispatch through the German Consul at Tien-Tsin, dated July 28, which says:

The German secretary of legation at Pekin, Herr Below, writes on July 21:

Thanks for your news. July 19 the condition of Cordes satisfactory. The remaining members of the legation are all right. The detachment of the guards lost ten killed and fourteen wounded. The houses of the legation, much damaged by cannon fire, are held by the guard. The attack of the Chinese troops on us ceased on July 16. Speediest possible advance of relief troops urgently necessarv.

According to trustworthy report the body of Baron von Ketteler has been burled by the Chinese Government.

The Cordes mentioned in this dispatch is the second interpreter of the German legation. He was with Baron von Ketteler when the latter was murdered, and himself was wounded. He escaped to the legation. The Japanese and Russian Governments also have news indirectly from Fekin, but all to the effect that the ministers, with the exception of Von Ketteler, are still alive.

Since it is now known that the foreign ministers at Pekin (save one) are still alive, the delicacy of the situation is greatly increased. The Chinese government seems to want to deliver them to the powers at Tein-Tsin, but to this the governments will not accede until the facts concerning their situation in Pekin are fully known. There seems to be a disposition on the part of the Imperial government to hold them as hostages or to use them for the protection of Pekin against the allied armies; and yet, it may be that they are protecting them from the Boxers. Minister Wu, at Washington, takes the latter view. Li Hung Chang, who is still at Shanghai, intimates that an attempt to relieve them by an army would endanger their lives. The powers, however, have not changed their plans to send an army to Pekin, and preparations for this movement are still progressing. Gen. Chaffee has arrived at Taku and is now in command of the American forces. vindication of Secretary Hay's position and and course toward the Imperial government at Pekin by the recent dispatches ought to greatly increase the influence of the United States with the powers in the settlement of their present troubles with China.

Panama has recently had an insurrection in which some severe fighting has occurred. The insurgent forces are said to have numbered about 2,000 and in the fighting which has occurred about 100 persons are reported killed. The attention of the United States has been called to this disturbance, and inasmuch as the United States is obliged to preserve the neutrality of the isthmus and to prevent interference with free communication with adjoining states, the United States will have to take some official notice of the affair and it is said that she has already ordered the cruiser Philadelphia to the scene of action.

The trial of Alexander Jester at New London, Missouri, for the killing of Gilbert Gates, twenty-nine years ago, will be concluded this week, but not in time to report the verdict in this paper. The taking of evidence was concluded last week and the lawyers are now presenting their views of the case to the jury. It is thought that the case will be handed over to the jury by Tuesday evening or Wednesday morning. From the instruction of the court it is hardly probable that the prisoner will be held for the crime with which he is charged. The case is of peculiar interest to the legal friternity because of the lapse of time since the occurrence of the alleged crime. -The trial of Caleb Powers, at Georgetown, Kentucky, for alleged complicity in the assassination of Geobel is still in progress. The defense is now presenting its testimony. Caleb Powers took the stand and confessed to having assisted in bringing the mountaineers to Frankfort previous to the killing of Goebel, but says that they were not brought for the purpose of taking life. He also denies and explains away the statements of the leading witnesses of the prosecution. But how the jury will regard the testimony pro and con is yet an unrevealed secret.

The premature discharge of a cannon at Camp Lincoln, Ill., on Monday afternoon, in which a number of persons were severely wounded, was an unfortunate affair. The accident was at first thought to have been caused by a carelessly tossed away cigar stub, but later opinion suggests that it was caused by the friction of the gun's ramrod, the end of which was unprotected with suitable covering. The accident happened during the encampment of the militia of the state, and that some were not killed is a great wonder to those who witnessed the accident. A court has been appointed to investigate the cause of the accident thoroughly.

The number of suicides reported during the past few days looks as if we were having an epidemic of this peculiar malady. The subjects of this mental disorder are not confined to any particular class of individuals, nor to any particular locality. Both men and women, married and single, rich and poor, during the past week have become tired of life and resorted to selfdestruction to end their troubles. The causes assigned, so far as known, are likewise varying in their nature, but may be chiefly summed up under financial and domestic troubles. There is something alarming about this quality of evil. It shows a low estimate upon the value of a soul, an ignorance of moral obligations, a defiance of law and of God, and a lack of courage that is indeed lamentable. Surely, here is a work for the church and the Christian religion, for no other power can reach and avert such catastrophes. The world could have no greater evidence of the need of a Savior and a saving power than in the instances of those who because of their surroundings resort to self-destruction.

The city of New Orleans has had another riot, in which twelve persons were killed, including one woman, and twenty-eight wounded, some of whom may die. The trouble began in an attempt of two policemen to arrest two negroes, Charles and Pierce. The desperate resistance of these two men resulted in a riot that necessitated the calling out of an additional police force and of the militia before order was again restored. The negro Charles took refuge in a house from which he for awhile held the entire force of the city at bay. The house was set on fire and Charles smoked out and shot, but not until after he had killed a number of his pursuers. For a time it seemed that a general war upon negroes would ensue, but order was finally restored and the city is again at peace. No city likes to have such a page in her history, but offenses will come, and when they come it is the duty of those in authority to protect life and property and to preserve order.

A DISCREDITED PROPHECY.

We are already beginning to hear in this presidential campaign the repetition of a direful prophecy which has been uttered we presume in every presidential conflict since the foundation of the Republic. It is the prophecy that if our party is defeated in this election it means the overthrow of the government established by the fathers, and the failure of the experiment of selfgovernment. This prophecy is uttered by representatives of both parties and always, seemingly, in great sincerity. No doubt many unsophisticated people are made to believe by these ardent patriots that liberty is hanging in the balance and that the destiny of the Republic is to be decided by the present campaign.

Now, we do not desire to underestimate the importance of the issues involved in the present campaign, although we believe they are egregiously overestimated by partisans on both sides. We have no doubt in our own mind but that the government at Washington will continue, no matter which of the various tickets in the field shall prove successful in November next. We have no thought that the people of this country are divided into two classes, one of which is seeking to overthrow the Republic and to establish an empire on its ruins, while the other is committed to the perpetuity of the Republic, nor do we believe for a moment that party lines are drawn on the issue as to whether corporations, monopolies and trusts should control production and prices and oppress the people. Nor are we prepared to accept the conclusion which some of the campaign orators will doubtless seek to enforce, that the honor of our flag is wholly in the keeping of one political party, together with the maintenance of public credit at home and abroad.

It is our confidence in the honesty, patriotism and integrity of the great mass of American voters which prevents us from believing this doleful prophecy, uttered every four years, that the perpetuity of freedom in this country and the principles of self-government depend upon the success of one certain political party. We believe the mass of the voters in each party is misrepresented by the campaign orators of the other party. The average American voter, regardless of the party with which he musters, loves his country, loves its flag, believes in honoring it at home and abroad, and believes in the principles of self-government, not only for himself and for the people of this country, but for the people of other countries.

He believes in honesty in politics, in equal and exact justice to all, and generally understands that his party stands for these principles. Let the reader take any one dominant issue between the two leading political parties, and let him take a statement of the party's position and interpretation of that policy from a representative of each of the two parties, and see what a shrinkage there is in the magnitude of the issue. The fact is, political partisans do exactly as religious sectarians do-they magnify the issues between themselves and others in order to magnify the importance of their particular sect or party. The religious partisan would make you believe that the triumph of the kingdom of God in the world depends on the triumph of the peculiar principles of his sect and if you will allow him to state what those principles are and what the other religious bodies stand for and will give full credence to his statement you will be almost forced to believe it. But the church of God depends upon the succes of no particular sect, and the Republic of the United States is likely to exist and to be a beaconlight to all the struggling nationalities of earth when present political parties shall have changed their policies, and when the issues which now divide them shall have been relegated to the dead issues of the past.

It is time the people had learned not to be deceived by this discredited prophecy. Let them intelligently select, advocate and vote for the party which they believe to represent those measures which make for the welfare of the nation, but let no one despair of the Republic in the event that his favorite party is defeated at the polls. Rather let him believe this, that the perpetuity of our government depends not so much upon this or that purely economic measure as upon the diffusion of intelligence among the people, and on the prevalence of those principles of righteousness and of justice on which alone a permanent government can rest. There is no doubt an undue emphasis of issues that are temporary and commercial in their nature, while there is a sad lack of emphasis on great moral questions which have to do with the life of the Republic. But as Christianity becomes more prevalent and more real in the life of the people, its great fundamental principles of equality, justice, fraternity and purity will be incorporated in the platform of the parties. Already are these principles so diffused among the people that no party can succeed who selects as its candidate one whose private and public life antagonizes them. Herein lies our hope of the stability of our form of government, and of our free institutions. So long as the mass of people shall maintain their sense of justice, of righteousness, of integrity, the genius of the Republic may say, with Tennyson's "Brook," somewhat modified:

"Parties may come and parties may go, But I go on forever."

And forever it will go on, until it shall have accomplished the purpose for which it was instituted, and until the kingdoms of this world shall have become the kingdom of our Lord and His Christ.

FUNERAL OF ALEXANDER PROCTER.

As announced in our last week's issue, Alexander Procter, of Independence, passed away from the life in the body to the unseen life, on the 24th instant. For several months he had been failing rapidly and his family and friends knew that the end was near. His last appearance in public was on April 21st, the occasion of his 75th birthday, when he attended church at Independence and preached his last discourse. The church building was beautifully decorated for the occasion with all manner of flowers, and a bank of these contained the figures "75." It was a fit ending of his public life. He himself felt and said this was his last discourse. There, in the building in which he had so often preached, and made sacred to him by so many precious memories, and surrounded by those whom he loved and who loved him, he spoke once more and for the last time for the public, of the goodness and love of God and of the beauty and glory of the spiritual world.

Since that anniversary occasion he has been growing gradually weaker, though he has insisted on rising each morning and dressing himself, even up to the very day of his death. He spoke to his family, to his physician and the friends who visited him calmly of his approaching dissolution, made a few requests and mentioned the names of the brethren whom he desired to be present and take part in the funeral services. Then, on the morning of the 24th, he peacefully "fell asleep," in the beautiful imagery of the New Testament, to awaken at last in the likeness of Christ. He had no fear of death, His faith in God and in Jesus Christ His Son had long since delivered him from any such bondage. To him death meant the soul's enfranchisement, its full liberty, its larger activity.

The funeral services were set for Thursday, the 26th. The mayor had issued a proclamation closing all the business houses of the town and there was an outpouring of people, not only from Independence, but from Kansas and from all the region round about. The casket was taken to the church at ten o'clock and lay there in state until 2:30 in the afternoon, the hour for the funeral service, and during that time the public had an opportunity to look for the last time upon the face of one whom they had known and loved so long. People of all religious bodies and of no religious connection, even the saloonkeepers of the town, not only closed their places, but joined in the procession to the cemetry to show their respect for their distinguished fellow townsman.

Bro. Procter had requested that the "grand old songs" should be sung at his funeral. Some of these were beautifully rendered by the choir. The pastor, R. Lin Cave, presided. Appropriate Scriptures were read by Corresponding Secretary T. A. Abbott. A tender, heart-felt prayer was offered by J. H. Hardin, of Liberty. Addresses were then delivered by the editor of this paper and by T. P. Haley, A. B. Jones and by the pastor of the Presbyterian Church, the latter representing the Ministers' Alliance of the city, and by A. E. Higgason, representing the official board of the church. Bro. Cave closed with a few appropriate words, telling how Bro. Procter had received him with an open heart when he came there to succeed him in the work. As we hope in a later issue to publish these addresses we do not stop here to characterize them further than to say that, apart from our own, they seemed to us to have been worthy of the occasion and just what they ought to have been. We have seldom witnessed a more solemn and tearful audience than that which sat and stood attentively through all these exercises.

At the close of the addresses a long procession followed the body to the beautiful cemetery near the town, where the casket was placed in a vault to await later interment. The benediction was pronounced by his kinsman and lifelong friend, T. P. Haley, and the tearful concourse of friends dissolved, saying to one another: "A great and good man has left us and gone to his reward."

It is gratifying that the married daughters, with their husbands and children, and the only son, were present at the close to comfort one another and to cheer the heart of the bereaved wife and mother. Our sincerest condolence is extended to them. At the same time we can but congratulate them on the rich legacy which they have in the memory and influence which yet remain of a life so pure and so consecrated to high thoughts and worthy ends.

We make no attempt here at an interpretation of Bro. Procter's characteristics as a man, as we have done that in the address delivered at his funeral, and which we expect to publish in connection with the other addresses in our next issue. It is our purpose to make that issue a memorial number and to publish a picture of our departed brother on our first page. We will only add here that a great and good man has gone from us. We shall miss him in our councils. We shall miss him in his hospitable home. A great voice has been silenced. A great heart has ceased to beat. But let us not doubt that elsewhere, in realms spiritual and eternal, that great mind still thinks the thoughts of God after Him, that great heart still loves, and that all his intellectual and spiritual activities are still going out after God and truth.

hour of Prayer.

THE PROFIT OF PRAYER.

(Job 21:15; Matt 7:7-11; 21:17-22.)
[Uniform Midweek Prayer-meeting Topic August 8.]
CENTRAL TRUTH: God hears and answers the prayer of an earnest, persistent faith, and the profit of prayer is communion with God and participation in the spiritual blessings which He alone can confer.

The question asked by the skeptics of Job's day, who enjoyed material presperity but who were afflicted with spiritual poverty, has been the question of the skeptics in all ages:

"What is the Almlghty, that we should serve Him?"

And what profit should we have if we pray unto Him?"

In the midst of material blessings, the source of which they do not recognize, they feel the need of nothing else. Their higher nature has been stifled, their nobler aspirations quenched, by their greed and gain. It is not strange that they should inquire why they should serve the Almighty and what profit they should have if they pray unto Him. Profit with such people means material profit. They can see nothing else. They are blind to their own spiritual poverty—to the imperative needs of their souls.

It is pleasant to pass from the company of this crowd of skeptics, which Job has summoned and described, to sit at the feet of the Master on the grassy slope of the Horns of Hatton, and hear what He has to say concerning the profit of prayer: "Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you; for every one that asketh receiveth, and he that seeketh findeth, and to him that knocketh it shall be opened." There is an inspiring assurance in these words which may well give courage to the fainting heart. As sure as we ask aright it shall be given us. As sure as we seek in the proper way we shall find. And just as certain as we knock at the right door it shall be opened unto us. It is a universal law. God is no respecter of persons, "for every one that asketh receiveth," etc. But the asking must be in accordance with the will of God. The seeking must be sincere, unselfish, persevering. The knocking must be full of purpose and persistency. By such conditions of receiving we are lifted up into a state of preparation for enjoying the blessing received.

As if still further to encourage prayer the great Teacher appeals to parental experience and love: "What man is there of you," He asks, "who if his son shall ask him for a loaf will give him a stone; or, if he shall ask for a fish will give him a ser pent? If ye, then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Father which is in heaven give good things to them that ask Him?" It would be difficult to imagine words that are better calculated to inspire confidence in the value of prayer than these of the Master. We know what delight it gives us to bestow gifts on those we love, especially upon our children. This, Jesus teaches us, is a feeble illustration of how God delights to give good gifts to His children. "Good gifts," mind you. We sometimes in our blindness ask Him for things which are not good for us, just as our children often ask us for things which our love for them prevents us from giving them. It is well to remember this when our prayer is not answered in the way in which we expected it to be answered. If God does not give just what we ask He will always give us something better in its place, although we may never be able here to see that it is better.

And then there is in this passage the recognition of our relationsnip to God as His children, which gives meaning and power to prayer. If the great Being who rules the universe is our Father, deeply solicitous for our welfare and more anxious to give good gifts to us than we are to receive them, then it is not difficult to understand the profit of prayer. We are limited and straitened in ourselves, not in God. Many a father would give vastly more to a son or daughter than he does if he felt they were able to receive it and to wisely use it. Our ability to receive and to use is the only limitation upon God's giving. O, how richly He would pour His blessings into our souls if we were only "hungering and thirsting after righteousness," and longing to be filled that we might better serve Him and our fellowmen! Mr. Moody once said that one reason why God did not bless us more richly than He did was that a little success puffed us up with pride and turned our heads. The great evangelist never uttered a truer word. O, for the grace of humility, which would enable us to receive in larger measure through prayer the good gifts of God!

When the disciples marveled at the miracle of the fig tree which had whithered at a word from Christ, Jesus told them that all things were possible to faith, and added: "And all things whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive." What a tribute; is this to the power of faith, that links the soul with omnipotence! What could we not accomplish in the way of removing mountains of difficulty out of the way of the progress of the gospel if our faith was strong enough? Have we not all reason to pray: "Lord, I believe; help Thou mine unbelief?" If we would only put away our sins we could more easily put away our doubts. If we would live better we could pray better. If we understood our spiritual needs it would give a zest to prayer which we do not often have. It is the hungry soul which God delights to fill.

What is the profit of prayer? Submissiveness, enlarged faith, purity of life, peace, fellowship with God, spiritual enrichment, power for service, the Holy Spirit. Is it not a marvel that we do not pray more?

PRAYER.

O, Thou who heareth and answereth prayer, the God of all grace and consolation, we thank Thee that we may call Thee Father and come to Thee with all the confidence which is born of that tender relationship. We thank Thee for the rich promises which Thou hast made us, and especially for the encouragement to prayer which Thou hast given us in Thy word. We praise Thee especially for the teaching and the example of Jesus in relation to prayer. Help us, O Father, to realize our spiritual poverty, to feel our need of Thee, so that we may delight in prayer. But teach us, we beseech Thee, to pray in faith and in the spirit of submission to Thy will, believing that Thou knowest and will do for us that which is best. Give us Thy Holy Spirit, that He may help us in our prayers, aid our infirmities and strengthen us for Thy And this we ask in the name of service. Jesus Christ our Savior. Amen!

Editor's Easy Chair or MACATAWA MUSINGS.

"Lives of great men all remind us We can make our lives sublime, And, departing, leave behind us Footprints on the sands of time."

As the sun at the time of his going down is seen to better advantage as it nears the horizon, so a human life, a great man, seems to stand out before the world in truer proportions in the act of his departure. Surely, the "Sage of Independence" never appeared greater than when he came near the borders of the unseen world and looked what men call death full in the face without a tremor of doubt or dread. How simple and how sublime was that life! He walked with God so habitually, and cherished high and pure thoughts so continually, that his face shone with "the light that never was on sea or land." Such a life ought, indeed, to remind us, "We can make our lives sublime." But only that life can be truly sublime that is lived under the inspiration of divine ideals, controlled by divine principles, energized by divine power and consecrated to divine ends.

This paragraph is written in Chicago, en passant, which, we are reminded, is one of the great political storm centers for the pending campaign. The national committees are getting out their literature, saying to the American voter, "Choose ye this day whom ye will serve." Would it be political treason for one to say, in response to this appeal, "Well, I have chosen. I am going to vote against the worst form of 'imperialism'-the imperialism of appetite and avarice, fostered by the saloon. I am going to vote against 'the free and unlimited coinage' of drunkards, for which the saloon stands. I shall vote against a 'debased currency'-a currency debased by being placed in a saloonkeeper's till. I shall vote against the saloon, because it builds up the trusts that enslave men, and destroys the trusts which make life worth living-trust in God and trust between husband and wife, father and children. I shall vote against the saloon as the 'paramount issue' in politics, because it is the desolator of the home, the destroyer of its sacred relationships, the debaucher of private character and public life, the breeder of poverty, disease and crime, the robber of little children, the slayer of strong men, the breaker of hearts, the chief fountain of misery and suffering, the foe to every virtue, the ally of every vice. It lowers wages, forfeits positions, oppresses working men, multiplies taxes, stifles conscience, makes cowards of politicians, sometimes muzzles the pulpit, dishonors the flag, imperils our free institutions." Well, if this be treason, here is your victim. Make the most of it.

It is good, after a long journey through heat and dust, to be back once more where we can smell the sweet breath of this inland sea, feel its cool breeze on our brow and listen again to the swish of its waves. One feels in a mood to pardon its eccentricities at times when it takes a notion to have some sport at the expense of those who are on its surface. Better this wide stretch of water washing the shores of Illinois, Wisconsia, Michigan and Indiana than another great agricultural state occupying its place. Better the fish that swim in its waters than the potatoes and corn and wheat that might have grown out of the soil of such a state. Better its purifying and cooling influence on the temperature, its modifying effect on the climate of surrounding states than a new commonwealth, with its political machinery, its offices, its honors and emoluments. If there seems to be a loss of produce and of taxable property by the substitution of a lake for a state in nature's great plan, think, too, of what a saving of expense. A lake requires no constitution, no elections, no governor, no legislature, no courts, no county officials, no mayors, no municipal governments with their corruption and franchisegrabbing; and no saloons, gambling hells or houses of illfame. Then, do not the beauty and the music of the lake, with its multitudinous voices and its infinite variety of color meet a want in human nature not met by corn and hogs, nor by herds and flocks? It is written: "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God." Some of these words are uttered by Lake Michigan.

The past week has added considerably to the population of Macatawa Park. Among these arrivals known to our readers are W. F. Richardson, of Kansas City, who has joined his family here, and Dr. W. T. Moore and wife from Columbia, Mo. Prof. Munro, late of Bethany College, spent last week here. The sermons here for the last three Lord's days have been unusually good, even for this place, where the grade of preaching is of high average. Dr. Adams, of the Advance, Chicago, T. P. Haley, of Kansas City, and Geo. H. Combs, of the same place, were the speakers, and they all delighted the audiences. Bro. Haley, like wine, grows better with age. He accompanied the editor of this paper to Independence, Mo., on the same sorrowful mission, and returned with him. To-day—for these lines are penciled Sunday morning—F. G. Tyrrell, of Chicago, is to speak to us, and we feel safe in predicting another good sermon. He is also to preach in Holland to-night. Bros. Haley and Rowlison have also preached in Holland recently. Some of the ministers there are catching on to what a bonanza they have in Macatawa Park as a source of ministerial supply for the summer. Next Lord's day our Macatawa Assembly begins.

OUR COLLEGES-VI. Endowment.

N. J. AYLSWORTH.

The twentieth century is to be a century of education. He who does not see this has not marked well the streams of tendency. The battles of this century will be thoughtbattles. It will not be the iron age or the golden age, but the age of intellect. He who wins here must win, not by might, but by mind. The burnishing of the intellect has wrought the miracle of our present civilization and given us a reign of wonders. The twentieth century will not forget this trick of powers, and its highways will be pathways of thought; its equipment, education. That people which is the greatest educator will lay its hands on this century. Other things being equal, the people that educates most will influence most. The church has hitherto held the key of knowledge. She must not surrender this key; and that people that forgets this will be distanced in the race of life. Are we ready for this? Are we great educators? Are we ready to stand forth in the lists and win in this arena? If not, we cannot too soon get ready.

There is another thing: We have a saying that "the good is the enemy of the best." This applies to the putting forth of effort. But when the effort has been put forth and our work has leaped into the arena of the world's struggling forces, another word speaks its destiny: The best is the slayer of the good. Wordsworth was a great poet, but brilliant Byron and chivalrous Scott long held him in eclipse. Today's newspaper may thrill us with interest, but to-morrow's will make it a "back number." The newest is slayer of the new. A splendid work of learning is selling steadily, but a revised edition will kill it. Nobody will buy it who can afford the latest. It is as good as it was yesterday, but it has been slain by a better. Our colleges may be good; but if they are not among the best of their kind it will work their undoing. Yon father is not going to handicap that bright boy, his pride and fond hope, with an inferior education, and cripple him forever in the race of life. He knows that education is power, and he wants the best. He may not leave his boy dollars, but he should leave him highest and mightiest manhood. We must not ask that father to do less, or father-love will slay us We shall have battles enough to fight without fighting this divine instinct. We shall not educate our youth if we have inferior colleges. We may plead and scold, but we shall sit in desolation. But we cannot have the best without endowment. Nay, we can no longer hold our present status without it. In this swift age others are passing us and we shall soon be slain by the best. The most momentous word of the hour is endowment. We have said of missionary work: "This one thing I do." It was well; but the most magnificent stroke of Home Missions will be the endowment of our colleges. There is no missionary like the college. If our colleges rank among the best they will draw a large contingent of students from the outside world for the sake of their excellent training; and in these spiritual homes we shall make these students both Christian and mighty, for education gives power. What converts are these-sweetened into Christians and greatened into giants! The college professor is our greatest missionary. The foreign missionary whitens the dark soul; the college teacher sends forth a mighty man for Christ. The Bible chair at our great universities was a happy thought, an inspiration and a splendid piece of missionary enterprise; but the endowment of our colleges is a greater work, and in the same line. The Bible chair is a great missionary, but not so great as the first-class college; and one cannot do the work of the other. All the mighty thoughts that have thrilled us for half a century with missionary zeal come thundering into ENDOWMENT. The argument does not run: We are imissionary, but we must endow our colleges; but: We are missionary, therefore must endow our colleges. The great missionary achievement of all time was the conversion of St. Paul. Next to Christ he has been the master of the ages. Our sublimest missionary work is the making of such masters-carving from the world's populations Christian educated men. We must get ready for this; we must endow-Now.

We are young and full of the fire of youth, and we have not hitherto been unwise. For a long time we battled for the restoration of primitive Christianity, but saw at last that in so much combat we were neglecting spiritual culture. turned our thought to this, and have drawn nearer to the Master. Then the hour struck for missionary enterprise, and we bounded forth into all lands. And now another deep tone is pealing from the clock of destiny; shall we hear and live? A cry has gone up all over the land from our colleges. Reolute men-men who have fed us with their heart-fires and lit the lamps of our pulpits-are alone, and the battle is pressing them hard. They are hurt, not for selfish ends, but because they cannot serve us as they would, and as we need. Shall we not rise in our strength to help them?

The pulpit is the fountain from which flow all religious streams, but the college is the fountain behind the fountain; and if it fares ill with this, all streams will go dry. Our colleges are struggling, and some have died. We are bleeding at a fatal place. The word of destiny is now endowment. Our college men are not the men to shrink from hardship; they are willing to suffer, but they are not willing to fail. The cry of brave men for help is ominous; it means danger. If we do not hear this cry it will be our sentence.

Endowment is our duty now. Then there will be another step to be taken, if we are to be a power in the next century. We must have a great university. We must be leaders in the field of learning, not simply led. But before we can have a great university we need great scholars—men whose names will have prestige in all lands. Our Bible chairs are a powerful stimulus to postgraduate work, and we shall have high scholarship if the conditions are favorable. But great scholarship cannot come without time for study and money for advantages. The stimulus to scholarship cannot bear fruit unless we take our professors off starvation wages and grant them both time and opportunity. The steppingstone to a great university and educational prestige is liberal endowment of our colleges at once. Do this and the rest will come; fail in this and the other will be long in coming.

The Methodist Episcopal Church has set itself the task of raising twenty millions of dollars as a closing act of this century; and half of this sum-ten millions-is to be devoted to the strengthening of their educational institutions. All Methodist peoples combined would aggregate only about five times our membership; and reckoning even on this basis we should put two million dollars into the endowment of our colleges with the close of this century if we are to do as well as they. To do this on the spot would be to our cause well-nigh a new birth. It would accomplish more than many years of plodding at our present rate. But as all Methodist bodies do not share in this undertaking it is fair to say that we could not reach this mark proportionally without raising perhaps three millions for our colleges; and we could do this if they can do that, and that without harm to our other interests. If we do not take some such step it will be because we are asleep, while others are awake to one of the most vital questions of the age. We have indulged in much self-gratulation since our Jubilee Convention last fall. It is time to cease looking back on our early past and "Behold how great we have grown!" The millionaire who gives a dime to-day may look back to the time when he gave but a penny, and say: "I am doing great things," but this trick of self-deception will not save him from shame. We have had jubilation enough. It is time to face the future and tremble. The sane word of the hour is that we are not doing well with our opportunities. Our cry should not be with the proud Pharisee: "Lord, I have done great things," but: "O, God, be merciful to me a sinner!" for we are great sinners in the presence of our opportunities, and even other peoples are putting our littleness to shame. STOP RIGHT HERE and answer this question: Why shall we not raise a large sum for our colleges . Now? Can we find any reason that we can utter without shame? It is no time for dreaming; for while we sleep the Master passes by. If any one knows any honest reason why we should not do this thing let him write it out in clean, bold lines and send it to the paper to be published. If there be no such reason let us indulge in no more self-gratulation, but hide our heads in shame until we are worthy to look other people in the face.

We have a telling plea, but it is not omnipotent against mistakes. We can be lost. We stand at the parting of the ways. Shall we be leaders in the world's thought, or shall we sit at the feet of others? The answer must come soon, for the age is swift.

CAMPBELL ON THE HOLY SPIRIT—III.

W. A. OLDHAM.

A word as to the meaning of the proposition between Mr. Campbell and Mr. Rice. Undoubtedly both used the words truth, word and word of truth as identical in meaning, because both meant by those expressions the Bible. Any man knows that truth and the Bible are not identical in meaning, for there are some truths which are not contained in the Bible, but Mr. Campbell and Mr. Rice during their discussion used the words as I have stated. I would be willing to leave the matter to three men and am satisfied that they would unanimously conclude that the thought of the difference between truth, word of truth and the Bible did not enter Mr. Campbell's head; that is to say, while preparing the proposition under discussion. I proved this in my last. If the editor will prove his assertion I shall rejoice, but in the absence of proof I stand my denial over against his assertion and the burden of proof is on him. If he has not the debate, will send it to him.

Again: "This constraining power of good works, of pure lives, is none the less the power of the Spirit because it has been transmuted into life and operates by example on the minds and hearts of men. To affirm any proposition that excludes this method of the Spirit's influence in conversion and sanctification would be to contradict, not only the Scriptures themselves, but the plainest facts of our religious experience." The writer affirms no such proposition, nor does he know of any man that does. The power of the Spirit is transmuted into life through the word. It is just as much the power of the Spirit when so transmuted as when it is transmuted abstractly or independently of the word. Mr. Campbell so affirms. Mr. Campbell emphatically repudiates the abstract operation of the Spirit. "No living man has ever been heard of, none can now be found, possessed of a single conception of Christianity, of one spiritual thought, feeling or emotion where the Bible or some tradition from it has not gone before him' (Debate, p. 619). Mr. Camp'ell also uses this language in the Harbinger of 1858: "We know that he works only through the written or spoken oracles of God. On this platform we have been building for more than five and thirty years." This over against the statement that Mr. Campbell changed his views on this question. He here plainly asserts that for more than thirty-five years he had taught that the Spirit operates through the truth of the Bible and denied that he operates apart from the Bible. "In conversion and sanctification the Spirit of God operates only through the word of truth, or always through the word of truth. The proper difference between us is the difference between sometimes and always" (Debate). The man who affirms any proposition that separates the Spirit from the word in conversion and sanctification contradicts, not only Mr. Campbell, but also the two books which never lie, the human consciousness and the Word of God.

Now as to the articles in the Harbinger of 1834. I shall be compelled to make brief extracts from them, because I have already trespassed too much upon the forbearance of the editor of the Christian-Evangelist and the readers of the paper. I shall in a little while present the articles to the public in full, but through another medium.

The articles in the Harbinger are headed "The Gift of the Holy Spirit." Mr. Campbell first settles the meaning of that expression. He asserts that the phrase means the Holy Spirit himself. "We have this phrase, the gift of the Holy Spirit, as has been said, but twice in all the apostolic writings (Acts 2:38, 10:45), both of which denote all that is comprehended in the promise of Joel, the Holy Spirit in all his miraculous powers" (p. 172). In the Harbinger of 1839, p. 381, we have this language: "It is now admitted that this was the impartation of miraculous gifts on the apostles, and that no one since that day has been baptized by the Holy Spirit. . . The writer of this article is incorrect in admitting this baptism to be confined to the day of Pentecost. The first Gentile converts in Cornelius' house were also subjects of it. Thus we have lived to see one of our most obnoxious tenets without note or comment adopted by two of our most popular journals." These journals were the Christian Watchman and the Christian Index, presumably Baptist papers. Mr. Campbell quotes: "We would respectfully and kindly ask them [who pray for themselves and others to be baptized with the Holy Spirit] if they had not better omit them [such prayers] as long as there was ground to fear that in using them they are guilty of the presumption of supplicating Jehovah for the miraculous powers of the apostles." This is yet good advice. Mr. Campbell makes the baptism of the Holy Spirit and the "gift of the Holy Spirit" identical, as these passages clearly show. I leave inferences to those who wish to make them. Mr. Campbell says: "No inspired man, saint or Christian, till John's death in the year of the world 4100, ever prayed to the Holy Spirit, asked or thanked him for anything. . . The unscriptural prayers addressed to the Holy Spirit and the hymns sung to him by those who study theology in the schools of human philosophy and not in the church of God show the state of biblical knowledge in this enlightened age of benevolent enterprise."

Mr. Campbell takes up various phrases used in the New Testament and explains them. I call attention first to his explanation of the phrase "demonstration of the Spirit:" "Demonstration of the Spirit is a public, evident, sensible display of supernatural power, on which the faith of a person may stand as on the power of God; or such a manifestation or exhibition of the Spirit, evincing beyond rational doubt that he is no knave or vain pretender who says that he has received the gift of the Holy Spirit. And perhaps it may be inferred that no man ever did possess the gift of the Holy Spirit who could not and did not afford a manifestation of the Spirit. For every manifestation of the Spirit, says Paul, was given to every spiritual man for the advantage of all, and unless the demonstration of the Spirit was to all it could not be of advantage to all" (p. 220). Article 3 is devoted to the explanation of "earnest," "seal," "oil of gladness," and to the article we must for lack of time and space refer those who may desire to know his views on the subject. We next call attention to Mr Campbell's conclusion as to the meaning of the phrase "fruits of the Spirit." The conclusion is all that is necessary, as the purpose of this paper is to show Mr. Campbell's opinions. In order to explain the phrase "fruits of the Spirit" Mr. Campbell explains the phrase "ministration of the Spirit." In view of the erroneous ideas now prevalent and at present being exploited as the teaching of the Bible, Mr. Campbell's explanation is lucid and refreshing: "The ministration of the Spirit is contrasted with the ministration of death, and what is called the ministration of the Spirit is also called the ministration of righteousness, and this again is contrasted with the ministration of condemnation. Now the thing which was formerly ministered is in verse 6 called letter, and the thing that is now ministered is called spirit." 2 Cor. 3:6 is the passage in question. "Our present object is to obtain the precise import of the phrase ministry or ministration of the Spirit. The contrast drawn by the apostle leaves no doubt in the mind of the attentive student that by these words the apostle only means the introduction of the gospel by the ministry of the apostles contrasted with the introduction of the law by the service of Moses." The letter is the law, the Spirit the gospel. The use of these words, letter and spirit, in any other sense is in harmony with the spirit of human philosophy, but not in harmony with the teaching of the Holy Spirit, Mr. Campbell being judge.

"The phrase 'fruits of the Spirit' in the connection in which it stands is equivalent to the fruit of the gospel. The gospel obeyed works out 'love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, fidelity, meekness, temperance-against such there is no law.' If, then, (as I presume the intelligent will preceive) the phrase 'ministration of the Spirit' means the introduction of the gospel by the ministry of the apostles, and 'the fruit of the Spirit' the practical results of the gospel in the heart, or the gospel obeyed, and the term 'spirit' in the style of the apostles occasionally means no more than the gospel, may it not be said that receiving the gospel into the heart is, in the apostle's sense, receiving the Spirit? The question at least deserves a careful and devout examination. It is obvious that Christ is received by receiving the gospel, and if Christ be received by receiving the gospel, why not the Spirit of God also?

"But besides this indirect and figurative reception of the Spirit of God, the Holy Spirit, by the gospel, these gracious influences, suggestions, illuminations, consolations and invigorating impulses of the good Spirit of God by and through the gospel in the heart, making the heart a cistern, a fountain, whence living waters constantly flow, is there not a substantive, real and unfigurative reception of the Holy Spirit himself, in the sense of the question asked the Galarians (3:2): 'Did ye receive the Spirit by works of the law, or by obedience of faith?" Such a reception of the Spirit there certainly was; and of this 'gift of the Holy Spirit,' this 'demonstration of the Spirit,' these 'spiritual gifts,' we have already spoken as conferred upon the first fruits in the last days of the Jewish age-in the setting up of the kingdom of the Messiah; but of such a reception of the Spirit since the LAST DAYS of the Jewish age, since the creation of one new man of believing Jews and Gentiles and the breathing into him the Holy Spirit of this new life, there has been no substantive, abstract and literal communication of the Holy Spirit to any man. Such is the experience of all the catholic congregation of Christ. There has arisen no prophet, no originator of new ideas, no worker of miracles, no controller of nature's laws, no person having any manifestation of the Spirit, or showing any divine power among men. Now these manifestations of the Spirit were for the benefit of the community; but the Holy Spirit as now promised and received through the gospel is for the benefit of the subject himself."

Mr. Campbell also says that the phrase "the Spirit bears witness with our spirit that we are the children of God" implies two witnesses, our own consciousness and the word of God (p. 509). "To be led by the Spirit" is in Mr. Campbell's phraseology to be led by what he says. Mr. Campbell also suggests that Luke 11:13 may be thus translated: "How much more shall your Heavenly Father give a holy spirit to them that ask him." The translation is exact and literal, as there is no article before Holy Spirit. Nothing but the erroneous view of the Holy Spirit led to its insertion in the translation. This must suffice. I refer the reader for fuller information to the articles themselves

I desire the thank the editor of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for his courtesy in permitting my lengthy articles to appear in his columns to the exclusion, it may be, of more important matter. In forwarding the article headed "Mr. Campbell and the Remission of Sins," I was under the impression that the editor was in St. Louis and not at his summer home. I was not attempting by guile to secure space. "Epithets are not arguments," and I have honestly tried to avoid them. May the truth prevail.

THE SPIRITUAL SIDE OF OUR PLEA.

The Word and the Spirit.

A. B. JONES.

We have said and repeat here that the Holy Spirit operates on the mind both through the medium of words and without such medium. This subject is not without its difficulties, its obscurities and even its mysteries. How impressions made by oral words upon the ear or by written characters upon the eye are transmitted along the auditory and the optical nerves to the brain and leap off its grayish matter into the mind-how they bridge this chasm between the material and the immaterialhow physical impressions on the brain are transmuted into thought during this leap from matter to mind—is mysterious if not mystical. The fact, however, is so obvious and so general that we do not hesitate to be-Is it any more difficult to believe lieve it. that mental impressions and suggestions may be transmitted by the Spirit of God to the human mind-transmitted directly and without the aid of the physical nerves? few years ago men would not have believed it possible to transmit a message in an instant across the continent by a wire. Now messages are being sent without the aid of

That the Holy Spirit directly, without the intervention of words, illuminated and inspired the prophets and apostles to speak and to write the will of God concerning human affairs is accepted by all believers in the Bible. And that this influence of the Spirit in no way impaired the individual freedom and responsibility of the person inspired is equally evident.

Moving upon a lower plane than that of inspiration in its supernatural sense, may not the Spirit operate upon the minds of men without interfering with their personal freedom and responsibility?

Are not all men conscious at times of suggestions and mental impressions pointing toward the right and inclining them toward God-impressions which they entertain, it may be, with hospitality and to their salvation in some instances, while in other cases the suggestions are resisted and repelled without permanent good results to the subject? What grounds in reason or in revelation are there for declaring such things wholly of time and sense-for excluding all divine agency in human affairs? Does this render the revealed word unnecessary? A man cao see reasonably well without glasses, but glasses help him to see. Are we to conclude, therefore, that glasses are unnecessary because he can see without them?

Man lives in two worlds, the physical and the spiritual. He needs the Bible, the revealed, written Word of God. In this he can read the mind of God through his physical senses. He needs this as an individual by which he may measure and weigh and properly estimate all his spiritual suggestions and impressions. Men associated together in society, in religious fellowship, need the written Word through which they may find common ground for affiliation and Christian intercourse. The unconverted world needs it. They are dominated by sense and sensible influences, and the Holy Spirit in seeking to convert and save men avails himself of the Word as the means of reaching their souls through their physical senses. All spiritual thoughts, impressions and tendencies may thus be compared with the revealed Word of God, that in the mouth of two witnesses the truth may be confirmed. He who cuts loose from the Bible and trusts only to mental impressions and his own spiritual tendencies is like a ship tossed upon the waves with uncertain port. And he who stifles and repudiates the indications and monitions of all spiritual impressions that come to him, he knows not how, and waits for the written Word in everything, will dwarf his spiritual life into the merest religious formalism. "Comparing spiritual things with spiritual words," is the only safe rule in religion.

CONVERSION.

Let us now consider the subject of conversion. Are sinners converted by the agency of the Holy Spirit without the Word of God, without a knowledge of the gospel of salvation, as revealed in that Word? To so teach is to release men of all moral responsibility, and to place the responsibility of nonconversion of sinners on God. To so teach is to open the way for the wildest vagaries of mysticism, superstition and fana icism. To so teach is to reduce religion to a system of mere fatalism.

Are sinners converted by the Word of the gospel without the personal presence and agency of the Holy Spirit operating and co-operating with the Word of Truth? To so teach is to emasculate the gospel, and to propagate the most superficial theological rot in its stead. No man who advocates such a theory of religion can ever be respectable among Christian scholars and thinkers. To proclaim such a theory of Christianity is a libel on the New Testament and a libel on the teachings of our fathers, and the promoters of such a monstrous perversion and deformity of truth can only bring reproach and discredit upon what is otherwise the most important and the most potent religious movement since the days of Martin Luther.

• The Word alone! Law alone! Nature alone! God excluded from his own govern-The divine immanence lost in the divine transcendence! What a caricature of both philosophy and religion, of reason and revelation! What great Christian philosopher ever committed himself to such theological twaddle? What great thinker or writer ever uttered such religious gibberish? Hear the Apostle Paul: "Our gospel came not unto you in word only, but also in power and in the Holy Spirit and in much assurance. . And ye became imitators of us and of the Lord, having received the Word in much affliction, with joy in the Holy Spirit" (1 Hear Alexander Campbell: "I do not maintain that a person is converted by the Thes. 1:5, 6).

Word only. I say that in conversion and sanctification the Spirit operates only through the Word, and not that a person is converted by the Word only. I have, indeed, no faith in conversion by the Word without the Spirit, nor by the Spirit without the Word. The Spirit is ever present with the Word in conversion and in sanctification. . . . The legitimate point of discussion in this proposition is not whether the Word operates, but whether the instrumentality of the Word be necessary. It affirms that the Spirit of God operates."

The foregoing extracts are taken from Mr. Campbell's speeches in the debate with N. L. Rice.

In the Millennial Harbinger for January, 1852, rage 47, we find this language of Mr. Campbell:

"I have no doubt that some of our brethren may have so expressed themselves, as if in the conversion of sinners it was all Word and no Spirit; nay, indeed, that the Word and Spirit are identical. I have on various occasions had to repudiate such an idea."

Men advocating such a sterile form of Christianity as Mr. Campbell here "repudiates" impoverish their own souls, and to the extent of their influence blight the spiritual life of all others who look to them for religious instruction. And in addition to this they bring discredit upon the brethren with whom they are ecclesiastically affiliated and upon the Church of Christ at large. If every such Apollos, "mighty in the Scriptures," "instructed in the way of the Scripture," "instructed in the way of the Lord; and being fervent in the Spirit," speaking and teaching "carefully the things concerning Jesus," but "knowing only baptism" for remission of sins, and the Word-alone theory of conversion and sanctification; and who "speak bodly in the synatheir shallow views on these subgogue" ects, could providentially have some Priscilla and Aquila hear him," and then jects, "take him unto them and expound unto him the way of God more perfectly." would be a great blessing, both to him and to the world, that he is to the extent of his influence so fatally misleading.

Luther's Statement.

DEAR BRO. GARRISON:-Bro. C. C. Redgrave asks for the source of the statement regarding Luther's disapproval of the use of his name as the head of the great religious movement that he inaugurated. It will be found in Luther's works, Vol. II, page 4. I found it in "The Life of Luther," by M. Michelet, page 262. Michelet quotes it word for word as Luther gave it utterance:

"In the first place, I pray you to leave my name alone, and not to call yourselves Lutherans, but Christians. Who is Luther? My doctrine is not mine! I have not been crucified for any one. St. Paul (1 Cor 3) would not that any one should call themselves of Paul, nor of Peter, but of Christ. How, then, does it befit me, a miserable bag of dust and ashes, to give my name to the children of Cease, my dear friends, to cling to these Christ? party names and distinctions; away with them all; and let us call ourselves only Christians, after him from whom our doctrine comes.

"It is quite just that the papists should bear the name of their party; because they are not con-tent with the name and dectrine of Jesus Christ, they will be papists besides. Well, let them own the Pope, as he is their master. For me, I neither am nor wish to be master of any one. I and mine will contend for the sole and whole doctrine of Christ who is our sole Master" (Luth. Werke, book II, p. 4). Fran Caldwell, Kansas, July 24, 1900. FRANK TALMAGE.

DANGEROUS CONDITIONS.

W. W. HOPKINS.

Optimism is all right so long as it is not oblivious to unrighteous conditions in our civilization. That these exist is too patent even for argument. That all unrighteousness is to be destroyed is certain, but this will never be done till the righteous of the land rise up in their might and declare that unholy alliances, unjust conditions and oppression, shall be no more. But the trouble is that the god of this world hath so blinded the eyes of some people that they are unconscious of the wrongs endured by their fellowmen in many of the walks of life. (If laboring men who are oppressed complain their complaint is not heard; if they strike they are condemned. This is not right. Every man should interest himself in the welfare of every other man. God never intended all the good things of this world for the few; neither did he intend that the many should be the slaves of the few. . Capitalists have their just rights in common with other men, but not more. Capital apart from man has no rights. \ It is the creation of manof labor. The divine rights of capital are as unfounded as the divine rights of kings.

The craze for wealth makes men hardhearted, cold, cruel, oppressive, robbers. It leads to the practice of all kinds of deception in business. No matter who is robbed or who suffers, so that their gains are increased. No matter what the method used, so that it is within the pale of law. Anything, everything, to add to their wealth. Their avarice knows no limit, no satisfaction. It looks to ordinary mortals as if a hundred million dollars would satisfy the most extreme mammon worshiper; but it does not. It looks as if a man who had gathered up (not made) a hundred million dollars (no man can make so much money in this life) would say to his fellowmen: "Gentlemen, I have made (?) enough; I will step aside and give some other fellow a chance;" but he will not. He wants more; he wants it all; he wants the earth. No wonder the Savior said that it was hard for a rich man to enter the kingdom of God. No such a man has or can have the love of God in his heart. (This is not a tirade against rich men. God knows that we need them; but it is a declaration against unjust conditions in our civilization, brought about by the dominance of wealth and of the wealth-seeking spirit in the world. We have not yet learned to look at homanity from the divine standpoint. We talk about the love of God, but we have not allowed ourselves to ask or to know its meaning. (We talk about the brotherhood of man and the Fatherhood of God, but it is talk only; we are far from its practice. Our civilization is framed upon the old might-makes-right doctrine and not upon a Christian basis. It is time, therefore, that we begin to see things in their true light. We have come to the parting of the ways and must choose between a Christian brotherhood and a despotism ruled by the god of this world. For a larger discussion of this question, read "Public and Private Rights," just out, by the writer.

LEWIS CASS WOOLERY.

BY J. R. W.

He who pauses at the newly made grave of Lewis Cass Woolery for the purpose of seriously contemplating his life and its labors will certainly realize that he is near the crumbling ashes of a great man, and he whose lips shall move to frame for his memory some eulogistic utterance need not fear transgression of the boundless realm of truth in which the able Woolerv moved. for in all that goes to constitute a noble character or combines to purify a human soul he was richly and variously endowed.

When he occupied the chair of Greek in Bethany College, the writer was a student in that great institution and a member of his classes. In the intimate relationship existing between the true teacher and the pupil there is abundant opportunity for judging character. No relation in life puts one to so severe a test. And it was here that Prof. Woolery bore himself always as the scholar, the gentleman and the Christian. There was no loud and boisterous expression of his opinion, no excessive claims of authority, no belittling of the weak. All was manly, buoyant, hopeful and helpful. As a professor Bro. Woolery always appeared to me to be sincere, devoted and thorough. He truly loved, with all the ardor of his generous soul, the students of the college, sympathizing with them in all their trials and difficulties. In the classroom he was the same sweet-spirited man that he was on the street or in his home. He stood before the student body for the highest ideals of life in word and deed. If he made a mistake in discipline, which was not often the case, he would apologize to a student as quickly as to any one.

It was my privilege to live in his house, and I know that as a husband he was tender and devoted -all that a wife could desire. His wife and his little daughter filled his heart and his husbandly and fatherly care was theirs in all its greatness. How sadly they will miss him their wounded hearts alone can tell.

Professor Woolery was a gentleman of the highest and truest type. To that magic Southern chivalry, which was his by nature in large measure, was added the truest type of broad Christian culture and acquisition. He seemed to be master of all those little amenities of life which mark the man of good breeding and towards all his fellowmen they were graciously manif-sted. From his genial soul to all about him, rich and poor alike, flowed a stream of broad human sympathy and love. And in all our hearts will ever remain the sweet memory of his gracious presence.

Back of every landscape, no matter of what character, whether of some quiet pastoral scene where wooded hills gently slope to some murmuring stream or the solemn, massive uplift of a mountain system whose deep-cleft canyons sink close to earth's hidden fires and whose peaks drop down avalanches of snow from their white locks. the thoughtful man can see the forces that produced the outline of wondrous beauty. So, back of the life of every man may be seen the forces that produce it. As the outline of Bro. Woolery's life towers before our vision with its greatness and firmness of character, its sweetness of disposition, the beauty of expression, fading away like a range of mountains in the falling twilight, we behold in the mind's eye the forces that formed this character-they were Christianty, education, choice. Of his form, his voice, his footsteps, nothing remains to us now but a dream; but the summer grass growing above his grave shall tell to the passer-by the story of his manly vigor and the fragrance of the flowers that unfold in silent loveliness about his lowly bed shall whisper to us of the clustering virtues that beautified his benign character.

- —A hall in Kansas City has been secured for the national conventions
- —There is one more missionary day—Church Extension Day—before the close of the missionary year; let it be a success.
- —It is not too soon to begin planning for the national conventions. Not to keep up the record of the Jubilee Convention in attendance will be to weaken our front before the enemy.
- —We are glad that our missionaries in China, thus far, have not been disturbed; but the present indications are not favorable to their continued safety. The anti foreign movement threatens to overrun the whole empire.
- —The gathering of all the powers of Europe against China is vividly impressing many minds with the prophecy of the last days at which time some suppose that all nations are to be engaged in deadly physical combat. It may be China's end, but not that of the world.
- -The gospel is the power of God for the salvation of society, of business and of our country, as well as for the salvation of men.
- -Every one needs a Christianity that is not subject to climatic influences; nothing short of the Christianity of Christ meets this demand.
- —The devil is about as anxious to keep religion out of politics as some churches are to keep politics out of the pulpit; but he can't do it.
- —The distinction between public and private rights is essential to honest government; too much emphasis is sometimes placed upon individual rights. Community rights often take the precedence.
- —The Golden Rule has practically been a dead letter for almost two thousand years. Some individuals have practiced it in a limited sense, but it has never been a popular rule of action, even among professed Christians.
- —"Paul the Persecutor" is a well-told story in our Family Circle this week which you will not fail to enjoy. Such presentations of facts from sacred history ought to make Bible reading popular with the young.
- —Among the contributions received by the New York India Famine Relief Committee was one of $10.50 from the Chinese in attendance at the Reformed Presbyterian Mission, Oakland, Cal., and one of $28 from the inmates of the Ohio penitentiary at Columbus. Is it not a little remarkable that free-will offerings for charity from a people who are themselves deprived of their liberty in one instance and house servants in the other should take so much interest in the condition of others in distant lands. Such offerings for humanity's sake ought to put to shame those who have plenty and to spare, and yet will not give to help a starving, dying people; will not even help their fellowmen as they should in our own land.
- —Recently the wife of a Presbyterian minister of this city told us that the Christian-Evangel. Ist was a favorite paper at their home. That their children were wonderfully interested in the Children's Department, conducted by Bro. Ellis. And that his "Red Box Clew" was "so interesting." This is a fine compliment to Bro. Ellis as well as to the C.-E., and we are sure the appreciation of Bro. Ellis and his department is of no small circle. Few writers have shown better tact with children than Bro. Ellis.

- -Public and Private Rights occupies prominent space in the New York and the Texas Letters this week.
- —The tribute to the memory of Prof. Woolery in this paper by one of his students is an eloquent one, worthy alike of the writer and of his subject. How deeply a teacher may impress the hearts of his pupils may be seen in this beautiful tribute.
- —A copy of the catalog of Kentucky University for 1899-1900 has just reached us and we find it the reflection of a prosperous school year and the prophecy of a bright future for this historic educational institution. Persons casting about for a desirable school will find in this hook of 116 pages many cogent arguments in favor of Kentucky University.
- —The Evangelist, published in New York, and one of the leading journals of the Presbyterian Church, has established an office in this city under the management of Rev. Samuel I. Lindsay, who also becomes an associate editor of that paper. The reason assigned for this expansive movement is the desire on the part of the management "to meet the progressive Presbyterianism west of the Mississippi River." "We do not know about the progressiveness of Presbyterianism East or West, but we do know Rev. Mr. Lindsay and can say that the Evangelist could scarcely have found a fairer, broader minded man in the West, and we feel sure that its interests in the West will not suffer in his hands.
- -And now comes the last great missionary offering of the year-that of Church Extension in September-and the special announcement of the Board of Church Extension, which we print elsewhere in our columns, should be heeded by the churches and pastors. On the churches now depends the success or failure. The board calls for but one offering in the year. The wide-awake churches will heed the call. In this announcement of the forthcoming September offering it is to be noted that but $20,000 is needed to reach the $250,000. Up to August 1st the receipts were over $30,000, and this without the annual offering. The remaining $20,000 needed to complete the $250,000 has been carefully apportioned among the churches. The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST urges every missionary church to do its duty. We must not fail to reach the goal.
- —F. P. Barry, of Galloway, Polk County, Fla., would like for some of our preaching brethren to locate in that region. It is a fine fruit growing country, especially strawberries, good climate and a splendid missionary field. Bro. B. would be glad to correspond with any preaching brother who would like to visit or locate in Florida.
- -War emphasizes the importance of the knowledge of the geography of any country so engaged. Our war with Spain brought to our knowledge names, places and peoples of whom we knew but little. The same was true of the war in South Africa. And now that all nations are deeply interested it the war with China its geography and history becomes at once a matter of importance to the reader. And to meet this demand for such knowledge Rand-McNally, of Chicago, have prepared a special atlas of China containing maps and descriptive matter such as the present crisis brings to the reader's attention. In this atlas, tesides its reliable maps the readar will find a concise review of the history, government, religion, industries, peoples, and relation to foreign powers, of the Chinese Empire. In the light of this atlas the reader will have no trouble in locating points of interest and in understanding more thoroughly the movements of the powers in the present crisis. The atlas contains some sixteen large pages besides cover.

- —We ought to support and encourage our state work as much as possible. Notice our item concerning the Christian-Evangelist special coach from St. Louis to Moberly, Mo., Sept. 17th, for those attending the state convention, and let us know if you expect to go. Address W.D. Cree, care this office.
- —A new quarterly, entitled the Missionary Bulletin, edited by E. C. Browning, corresponding secretary for the state of Arkansas, has made its appearance, and for neatness and editorial care we have seen nothing better. In this number the ministers of the Arkansas Christian Missionary Convection and the C. W. B. M. are given in addition to several pages of editorial matter. We are sure that Arkansas needs such a journal as this, and we trust that they will take great pride in extending its circulation.
- —We trust that our active friends realize how liberal is our offer to send the Christian-Evan-GELIST for the remainder of this year to new subscribers for only fifty cents.

Remember that the more promptly subscriptions are sent in, the more issues of the paper you will receive. If sent at once subscribers will receive the Christian-EvangeList for five months and in less time than that will become much attached to it. Securing renewals Jan. 1, 1901, at regular rates will be an easy matter.

- —The annual catalog of Hiram College and the annual report of President Zollars appear in separate binding. The catalogue is a neatly bound magazine of 96 pages, devoted to the equipment and attendance of Hiram College for the year 1899-1900. The annual report of President Zollars is a magazine of 40 pages, devoted to the efficiency and outlook of the college. This being the Jubilee Year of Hiram College makes these announcements peculiarly interesting. Híram College is now before the world more fully than before, and it is well that this report and this catalog have been so well prepared to meet the increasing demands for information concerning this educational institution.
- —All brethren and sisters living in St. Louis or points between St. Louis and Moberly, who expect to attend the Missouri Christian Church convention at Moberly, September 17 to 20, are invited to send their names to W. D. Cree, in care of this office. The CHRISTIAN-EVANCELIST will secure a special coach for their accommodation if a sufficient number will go. Those who can arrange to come via St. Louis or junction points en route are included in this invitation. The special coach will be attached to train No. 3 on the Wabash Railroad, leaving Union Station, St. Louis, at 9:15 A. M., Monday, September 17, and arriving at Moberly at 1:25 P. M. Send your names at once in order that we may know what arrangements to make.
- —Our missionaries in China were all safe at last reports. Many had gone to Shanghai, where it is believed there is ample protection. No doubt all are there at this time. The executive committee of the Foreign Society is doing all in its power for the safety of their missionaries and their families.
- —All who take advantage of our special fiftycents trial offer now will receive twenty-two copies of the Christian-Evangelist by Jan. 1st, 1901. That is at the rate of about two and one-fourth cents apiece. Not only that, but the accounts of many of the state conventions and also of our great National Convention at Kansas City will appear during that time. These accounts alone will be worth to our readers several times the amount paid, without mentioning the usual fine literary features of our journal, so well recognized and appreciated by our readers. If you have a friend anywhere, now is the time for him to subscribe.

- —The Japan mission will be reinforced during September by five new missionaries: F. E. Hagin and wife, Stanford, rll., G. S. Weaver and wife, Eureka, Ill, and Miss Carme Hostetter from Ohio.
- -The receipts for foreign missions to July 25, amount to $145,954.33, or a gain of $21,309 32 over the corresponding time last year. If we reach the $200,000 this year the churches will have to be diligent in forwarding offerings.
- —"Nations as well as individuals have a perfect right to do good unto others, but they make a great mistake when they try to beat it into them."—Saturday Evening Post.
- —"About the time people make as much fuss over their religion as they do over their politics the millennium will be along."—Saturday Evening Post.
- -The growth in the circulation of the CHRIS-TIAN-EVANGELIST this year has been very gratifying, even exhilarating to us. We feel under obligations more than ever to furnish the brotherhood with a representative, national journal, that may be compared with any of our religious contemporaries, and-we may say it modestly-we think we are doing it. We are now offering to send it to new subscribers for the remainder of the year 1900 for only fifty cents. Why? Because we want even more readers during 1901 than we have had during 1900. Those who read the paper until Jan. 1st, 1901, will scarcely desire to part with it at that time. Here is a chance for the introduction of good literature in our congregations.
- —There will be several additional free scholarships for distribution by Luray College, for young ladies, at Luray, Va., session 1900-1. In applying please address the principal, Prof. M. M. Hargrove, Luray, Va., giving name in full, post office address, proficiency in studies and reasons for asking aid.
- —The Christian Missionary Magazine for July, published quarterly by T. A. Abbott, corresponding secretary for Missouri, contains the minutes of the Missouri Bible-school convention, held in California in June, and also the program of the state convention, to be held in Moberly, Mo., Sept. 17-20, and is therefore an important edition. Send for a copy, 1123 Oak St., Kansas City, Mo.
- -The following clipping from an exchange will be of interest to those who are studying the race problem:
- Of collegebred negroes, the report of Prof. W B. Dubois, which was presented to the Atlanta University Conference, showed that the 2,414 negroes who have graduated from colleges in this country since 1826 have, with few exceptions, found work, have manned and made possible the negro common school system of the South and have accumulated property averaging an assessed value of $2,500 to each person. In view of these facts, the members of the conference, which is composed of educated negroes, many of them ranking high in their profession, give it as their opinion that "there is a legitimate and growing demand for the college training of a few carefully selected young negroes of ability," the general principle being an applicable to the black man as the white, that he shall have "an educational opportunity commensurate with his ability."
- —Accept my hearty endorsement of your words of praise on "The Teaching of the Rooks." They are certainly justly bestowed. It is drinking out of a running stream to read them. In my humble judgment expository preaching is the need of the hour. I am preaching on Sunday mornings on Old Testament worthies, and the attention is delightful. I shall soon begin "book by book" from the New Testament, and Campell & Willett's "The Teaching of the Books" is the best thing by long odds that I know of for intensely helpful and suggestive matter for a busy pastor.

The pastor at Hannibal, Mo., will spend his month's vacation, beginning after the first Sunday in August, at Chautauqua, N. Y., and Carrollton, O. During his absence the elders will conduct the communion services in the morning and the Y. P. S. C. E. will have an evening service at the church hour.

J. P. Campbell, of Doniphan, Mo., says: "The little band of Disciples here has called Bro. Robert Macey Talbert, a graduate of the Theological Department of the University of Kentucky, of Lexington, Ky., as pastor, and we hope to let the wold hear from Doniphan in the future. We are few in numbers, but we trust we are faithful, and therefore we hope to be successful in His name.

Claris Yeuell reports $50.00 raised in his field for foreign work, as against $17.00 last year. He expects soon to start North for the Kansas City Conventions and can be had for meetings and lectures on the way. "Mountain Missions, or on the Summits of the Sunny South," and "The Race Problem," lectures which he is delivering, are said to be highly entertaining and instructive. Bolton says: "I am persuaded that he will aid the cause of missions wherever he may deliver his series of lectures. His work is presented in a unique and popular manner. While with us his congregations grew from the first. Send for him."

President McKinley and Liquor.

Bro. M. M. Davis, of Texas, recently raised the question as to whether President McKinley drank. A communication just received from the managing editor of the New Voice concerning the above question says: "In reply to your letter of July 30th I will say that the best testimony with which I am acquainted upon the subject of the President's drinking is the testimony of my own eyesight. I saw him drink champaign at the banquet in Chicago last fall. The second best testimony of which I know is the fact that the Methodist ministers of Milwaukee were so amply convinced that he did drink at the banquet in Milwaukee that they sent him a letter of reproof and protest."

[Signed] W. F. Furguson.

The New Voice of March 1, 1900, devotes about one page to the above subject, in which it has the picture of President McKinley representing him in the attitude of drinking at the banquet table.

The evidence along the line is such that it seems we can scarcely question longer the reports current regarding the matter. Whether he personally drinks or not, his attitude upon the "canteen" question ought to leave no doubt in the mind of Bro. Davis, or any other person, that the administration presided over by President McKinley does not hesitate to aid in the "expansion" of the liquor interests of the country.

Healthy Schoolma'am

FOUND OUT HOW TO FEED HERSELF.

Many school teachers, at the end of their year's work, feel thoroughly exhausted and worn out, physically and mentally. The demand upon the nerves and brain of a teacher is unusual and unless they are well fed and fed upon properly selected food, it is natural that they should run down.

A little woman teacher at Gobleville, Mich., who has been teaching regularly for a number of years, has always found herself thoroughly exhausted at the end of the session, until within the last year she has made use of Grape-Nuts Food with the result that she closed the year as a robust, healthy, strong, vigorous woman, having gained in weight from 90 pounds to 126; her nerves strong, face bright and cheery, and really a wonder to all her friends, who constantly comment on her color and strength. She knows exactly to what the change is attributed, for in the years past, living on ordinary food, she has almost broken down before the school year closed, whereas since using Grape Nuts, this change has been brought about; evidence prima facie of the value of Grape-Nuts Food for rebuilding the brain and nerve centers.

The name of the teacher can be given by Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich.

Robt. B. Fife.

On our first page this week appears the picture of the man who planted the First Christian Church in this city. Robt. B. Fife came to St. Louis in 1835, and in October, 1836, organized the church in his own house. Having been an elder in Virginia he became the first preacher of primitive Christianity in this city and the first pastor of the first church organized upon the basis of the Bible and the Bible alone as a rule of faith and practice in religious life. He was a man of excellent intellectual, moral and spiritual qualities, efficient in teaching, yet of modest demeanor in his Christian living. Few men indeed seem to have possessed more of those qualities of character that endear men to their families, their friends, the church and the community than did Robt. B. Fife. He was greatly beloved by all that knew him, and the fragrance of his sweet and beautiful life is still perceptible in this city. Though dead he yet lives and speaks Robt. B. Fife was born in Edinburg, Scotland, on the 15th day of April, 1792, and departed this life in this city at the good, ripe age of 86 years, having retained the vigor of his mind to the end. Having been educated in Edinburg, he left there for America at the age of 18 years, settling in Virginia. At the age of 21 he married Miss Sarah L. Banks, a descendant of the famous old Virginia family of Bruce. He was in the war of 1812, after which he resided in Fredericksburg, Va., until his removal to Missouri in 1835.

When the principles of the Reformation, as plead by Alexander Campbell, were proclaimed among the Baptists of Virginia, he was among the first to embrace them. But under the influence of the famous "Dover Decrees," by which those who embraced the rectoration movement were excluded from the Baptist Church, a new congregation was organized in which the subject of our sketch took a leading part and became a prominent factor. The circumstances under which this step was taken needed no justification. No other course was open to those excluded, and they could not neglect so great a salvation or the importance of so great a movement in religious history as that inaugurated by Alexander Camp-

Associated with Robt. B. Fife, then, is the beginning of this Restoration movement, the first half century of its history and the founding of that movement in St. Louis, all of which to relate here would exceed our limits. But for a more complete history of this worthy pioneer and father in Israel we refer our readers to Dr Hiram Christopher's beautiful tribute to his character and sketch of his life published in the "Dawn of the Reformation," by T. P. Haley.

Procter Memorial Number.

In an editorial elsewhere on Brother Procter's funeral we have announced that the next issue of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST will be a memorial number to Brother Procter, and will contain the addresses delivered at the funeral. It will also contain a good likeness of Bro. Procter on the first page. There are doubtless others who would like to lay a brief tribute on the grave of Brother Procter in this memorial number. We desire to accommodate as many as possible who may desire to do so, but of necessity these tributes must be very brief. They should reach us as early as possible. A great and good man has passed away from us, and it is fitting that we honor his memory in a memorial number, in which those who knew him and loved him may have an opportunity to express their appreciation of his character and work. This is the purpose of the memorial number. Let us have a prompt response, and when practicable let it be on a postal card to insure brevity.

A Word to Brethren.

I believe that a word to our brethren about Hot Springs' work at his time through the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST will save me much time and others disappointment. I am receiving letters every few days of the nature of the following:

> "P-Mo., July 2.

DEAR BROTHER KINCAID, Brother: A life-long member of this church, a worthy but poor man, will leave here in a few days for your place for his health. He has been afflicted for years and has been a great sufferer and goes in the hope of getting relief. The church hear is bearing his expenses to and from Hot Springs, which is quite expensive, but we feel that it is money well spent. Now, my brother, will you meet this brother at the train with a buggy, and find him a boarding house, and see that he does not want for anything while there. He is entirely worthy your assistance. Whatever you do.for him will be appreciated by myself," etc.

I am entirely unable to render assistance to those who come without writing or knowing the situation here. I only wish there was some way to bring the great importance of this work before the church at large, so we could have means to build a "Christian Home" where we could care for these worthy afflicted ones, but as it is, brethren, we cannot. We cannot meet them at the train. We cannot procure boarding places; to do so, would occupy all my time at this alone. We can only visit those who are in great need of our help when they do come. Remember that this is a great health resort, a place where hundreds are arriving every day, and that we are but one "poor little preacher," preaching for a mission church of 80 members, assisted by the state and general board. One would judge from the nature of many letters we receive that the impression had gone abroad that this church was rich and mighty in numbers; we are not. Send your friends, but send them with money to pay their way, plenty of it, too. This is an expensive place to live. We will do all that we possibly can to cheer them while they are here, but please, please do not send them with no means; if you do they may suffer. We can only do so much and no more.

Cost of living while here will be about $5 per week for board, $6 for 21 baths, $25 per month for medical care. By all means no one should come with less than $60 for one month's stay. They may be able to get along on $30 or $40, but they should be well provided with money. I have written this in explanation to many letters I did not answer. I cannot answer letters without a stamp is inclosed; bear this in mind when writing. We are laying plans for a "Christian Home;" if we succeed, then we can care for all who come and wish us to, but not now.

The Unpublished Book.

The writer was unaware that a book was in the throes of birth. Still, he sees no reason why objectionable material may select the time for criticism. A genius for opprobrious epithet is not erratic; that term is too feeble to describe.

The Lands of the Long Day-IV.

FJORDS AND FJELDS OF NORWAY.

[Fjord, a deep and narrow arm of the sea, in shape resembling, with its ramifications, the trunk, branches and limbs of a tree; in Norway generally bounded by abrupt mountain walls.

Fjeld (pronounced fyeld), a term applied in Norway to a mountain, a group of mountains, or a mountainous plateau. Compare the English "fell," as used especially in the Lake District.

-Dictionary.

The geography of the western coast of Norway is an exceedingly intricate matter. The coast line is tangled past all unraveling. It ties itself in hard knots, sends long loops inland and loses its loose ends among the mountains, but there is no reason why the reader should be asked to trouble himself with the details of all this crock-When seen on the map the various edness. fjords all look as much alike as a crowd of Chinamen, and I doubt whether it is possible, by any ordinary amount of reading about Norway, to get a very vivid impression of the different fjords, their special characteristics and their relation to each other. Yet, each Chinaman in the crowd is an individual human, whose friends recognize him as different from the others, and each kink in that coast has its own individuality and its own associations for one who has seen it and lingered and studied the various possible routes from this point to that through this maze of mountain and water.

But though the combinations are complex, the elements are few and simple: fjord and fjeld. The great, mountainous plateau of Norway, which, is highest on its western side, is, in a strip fifty or seventy-five miles wide, measuring from the outer coast line, furrowed by narrow and tortuous arms of the sea. It is also cut here and there by valleys which may, with more or less accuracy, be described as gorges. The roads run in these vallevs, as a rule, and the vallevs in general run from one fjord to another. The process of cycling through this part of Norway, therefore, consists in riding from a fjord up a valley (with a climb perhaps of one or two or three thousand feet), down the valley on the other side to the next fjord, crossing it by steamer or rowboat to the mouth of another valley, which may be directly opposite or may be fifty miles away, and repeating the process ad libitum. The cyclist is less independent here than usual, because he must frequently desert his proper element and take to the water. The accompanying disadvantage of having to make connections with steamers is obvious. It is especially disadvantageous to one whose ordinary mode of travel relieves him of the necessity of making connections with anything except three meals a day.

It is to be remembered that Norway is not a land of railroads. In all western Norway there is but one line, and it is only sixty miles long, a little road running inland from the city of Bergen. For the ordinary traveler there are two possible modes of procedure. He may take one of the tourist steamers which start periodically from English and German ports and cruise along the coast, running into the principal fjords and allowing time for excursions inland at the most interesting points. Or, if he desires more freedom to arrange his own itinerary, he may travel overland by horse power, making more or less accurate connections, according to his foresight and luck, with the local steamers which ply on the several fjords.

Considering the dependence of all travelers upon roads and horses, the government spends great sums of money in building and repairing the roads and maintains an efficient posting system, which enables one to secure almost anywhere a horse, driver and vehicle for two persons at a fixed rate of about ten cents a mile. The motor power is furnished by a lean and diminutive pony, which can climb mountains all day and be ready for a frolic at night. The vehicle is an absurd looking two-wheeler with a bracket projecting behind on which the driver sits and wields the reins over your shoulders, giving you an unobstructed view of the scenery and the horse. The Jehu himself usually appears in the form of a small boy apparently incompetent to preside over any steed more fiery than a hobbyborse. He has to be small, so that his weight behind will not tilt the whole machine and lift the pony off his feet. The total effect can scarcely be called impressive, but these "stolkjaerre" is said to be a fairly comfortable, and it is certainly a convenient and cheap means of conveyance.

The region is almost as devoid of towns as it is of railroads. One journeying by my route from Christiania to Trondhjen in a broad semicircle to the west will travel seven hundred miles without seeing more than one town of over a hundred inhabitants. This one is Voss, a place of twelve hundred and the inland terminus of the abovementioned railroad. But every "skyds-station," or posting station, is also an inn. Some of them are very simple, but I do not remember to have seen a grain of dust in any of them or a morsel of food that was not appetizingly served.

I said that there are practically no towns. To be sure, there are plenty of names on the map which seem to be names of towns. But the map of Norway is large and the mapmakers can afford to be generous with names. Sometimes a name, printed in large type on the map, will indicate a "skyds-station" with not another house within ten miles; sometimes an isolated church; sometimes a "gaard," or farm, with its cluster of buildings; sometimes only a "saeter," or herdsman's hut, which having been there for a long time has come to be regarded as a sort of landmark. More than once I have ridden over a road which struck me as being particularly lovely, and have noticed afterwards that the map of that locality was studded with names thicker than the suburbs of Boston.

The first fjord which I saw was perhaps as nearly typical as any and I do not know where one can get a happier first glimpse of fjord scenery than the Sorfjord at Odde. It had been a game of walk-and-push for five miles up a mountain pass and then a much longer and gentler descent through a gorge, which soon wilened into a smiling valley with milkwhite waterfalls tumbling over the cliffs which bounded it. At the end of this valley, or more accurately, as the continuation of it, is the fjord. The valley is still about the same width-perhaps half a mile and slowly widening. The mountain walls still rise abruptly to the same snowy height. But the floor of the valley now is water, upon whose unruffled surface the mountains and the clouds show as deep as they are high. The great glacier of Folgefond, which lies upon the mountain at the west, peers down through every narrow valley, and now and again sends down an icy arm which grasps in vain at the farms that cling to the foot of the cliff wherever a bit of alluvial deposit gives them a chance to take root.

Think not of broad acres when I say "farms." A field is as big as a pocket handkerchief. A towel would cover a farm. A piece of cultivated ground the size of a tablecloth—well, they don't have it, but if they had it would be a landed estate I suppose.

In a country which is as much traveled and as sparsely populated as the west coast of Norway one sees almost as many tourists as natives. The tourists, to be sure, are not yet out in full force. Although June is the best month for traveling in Norway there are fewer visitors than at any other time in the summer. Perhaps that is one reason why it is the best. At least it is an advantage always to find plenty of room at the hotels. Half the time I have been the sole guest. Attention and service were perfect, and prices were moderate in expectation of a big crowd later on. But even now one meets some very pleasant people here and there. There were some St. Louis people whom I ran across by accident. There was a little Scotch couple whom I met on boats two or three times and whose intelligent enthusiasm cheered me mightily. There was a retired captain from the British army, who now divides his time between hunting Barbary sheep in Algeria and knocking about in the Pryenees with a mule, a cook and a courier, with occasional trips to Norway for salmon.

One of my richest "finds" was a group of middle aged English fishermen whose society I enjoyed for more than a day while waiting for a boat. There was one whom they called "Colonel" - and this was not in Kentucky-who told a good story about the fate of "a couple of dozen two pound pots of marmalade" which he had imported into Sicily once for his own use during a visit of a few weeks. There was another who looked like Du Maurier's Taffy, and had an estate and tenants. He told of an old college chum of his, now a Church of England "parson," who had just gotten what he called "the best living in England"-a parish with a beautiful old church, a fine old rectory, a splendid troot stream running right through the estate, the right of rabbit shooting over twelve hundred acres of land and scarcely any people in the parish. What more could a parson want? The third had rheumatism, but his sporting instinct was so keen that he still drove up and down the bank of the river and occasionally made a cast for a salmon, but always had to hand the pole over to his gillie to play and land the fish.

As to the Norwegiaus themselves, they seem to me to have been as little spoiled as any people could be by their habitual catering to tourists. It is a fearful strain on the national character. Their natural independence, combined with an obliging disposition and considerable experience in the business of dealing with tourists, has made them attentive without servility and enterprising without covetousness. And yet, with all their vigor and enterprise, one feels, after living among these people for awhile, that there rests upon them s certain settled melancholy. Their faces are not the faces of happy people, but of those 'whose thoughts dwell upon the darker side of life. The visitor who comes and sees and goes away takes with him the impression of the "mountain glory," of which Ruskin speaks; but those who dwell permanently in these remote spots, shut off from the world by rocky barriers except as a little stream from the outer world flows in every summer to look at those very barriers-these inherit the "mountain gloom." In short, they read |bsen W E. GARRISON.

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

Worcester, Mass., is a wide-awake, progressive d prosperous city of possibly one hundred and enty-five thousand people. A gentleman whose quaintance is on both sides of the Atlantic ys that Worcester is the cleanest city, moralthat he has seen. When you think of "the ete East" you ought to be reminded that some these Eastern cities, many of them in fact, are owing in population and wealth with a rapidity milar to that of prosperous cities in the West. successful business man entertained me a few vs ago with remarks concerning progress in the cumulation of wealth made in recent years by sidents of this city. The question was, Have ung men now a chance to get on in business equal the opportunities possessed by their fathers? he conviction expressed was that there never s been in the history of our country a better me for ambitious and capable young men to get start and achieve success in business than the esent. This is not my first visit to Worcester. or almost thirty years I have had an acquaistace with the city. Men here who a few years go were at the bottom of the financial ladder e now well up toward the top. The United tates is now, as in the past, the land of oppornity. But it is such for those who have ability -who are intelligent, industrious, frugal, tempere, energetic, resourceful. Men of this characr have succeeded in the past and they are chieving success now.

The Hon. Geo. Bancroft, the historian, was orn in Worcester. This was his home and here

The Hon. Geo. F. Hoar, United States senator, ves in Worcester. He has been in continuous brvice as one of our national Solons since 1869. e is probably eighty years of age, but is apparntly as vigorous and as eager for the fray as a oung man.

Worcester was the home of John B. Gough. is body rests in the beautiful Hope Cemetery. n his gravestone are inscribed the words which all from his lips as, at the close of a characteriscally impassioned address, he fell dead. He

"I CAN DESIRE NOTHING BETTER FOR THIS GREAT OUNTRY THAN THAT A BARRIER HIGH AS HEAVEN E RAISED BETWEEN THE UNPOLLUTED LIPS OF THE HILDREN AND THE INTOXICATING CUP; THAT EVERY-HERE MEN AND WOMEN SHOULD RAISE STRONG ND DETERMINED HANDS AGAINST WHATEVER WILL EFILE THE BODY OR POLLUTE THE HEART AGAINST GOD AND HIS TRUTH."

It was in Worcester that Joel Stratton, a vaiter in a temperance hotel, touched the drunken bookbinder and said: "John, go with me to a emperance meeting." The invitation was acepted, the meeting was attended, the pledge was igned, the drunkard became sober and the world gained the inimitable temperance orator, John B. Bough.

This was also the home of Elihu Burritt, the learned blacksmith," who when working at his orge studied the languages until when he came o the prime of noble manhood was a prodigy of inguistic attainments. Mr. Burritt was a good man as well as, under the circumstances, a emarkable scholar.

It was in Worcester that John Adams, the first Vice-President of the United States and the second President, studied law. John desired to be a preacher of the gospel, but was not in sufficient accord with the theological thought of any denomination to find a place in the ministry. Failing to become a minister he became a statesman.

This is the region in which "Shay's Rebellion" arose in 1786. The rebellion was sufficiently formidable to prevent the meeting of the court in Springfield, about sixty miles across the country from this place. An attempt of the same kind was made in Worcester, but failed. Daniel Shay, from whom the rebellion has its name, fought at Bunker Hill. He was a captain in the army of the revolution. His service in that historic struggle for liberty was honorable. After the war times were hard with a hardness of which we know nothing. Of money there was none. The men who had served in the army had not received their promised pay, nor was there a reasonable prospect that they would receive it. The rebels thought that the salary of the governor was too large. Those who were in authority put on too much Hungry, half clad, desperate were these men. The rebellion broke out in the midst of the winter. Snow was on the ground. The weather was very cold. Some of the rebels had no shoes on their feet. Speak gently of the men who under such provocations took up arms against a government which hardly deserved the name. Those were days in which the hardest of hard words were spoken against those in office. It is safe to say that no words so bitter will be spoken against any man seeking office in the current campaign as were in those days uttered against the men who are now regarded by all parties as political demigods. Men were imprisoned for debt-and such prisons! Prof. John Fiske calls the time here spoken of "the critical period in American history." "Say not, then, What is the cause that the former days were better than these? for thou didst not inquire wisely concerning this." We are now enjoying better times than were ever before seen in the history of our country.

Corgregationalism is the dominant phase of religion in Worcester. The Congregationalists are the people in this glorious old town, but there is one church here called simply "Church of Christ." Its place of meeting is 829 Main Street. It owns a good house of worship. R. A. Nichols is pastor. The church has in its membership some choice spirits. This Church of Christ in Worcester, Mass., is one of our best congregations. The pastor was one of our most successful evangelists at the time of his settlement, about four wears ago. As a result this church has more than the usual amount of evangelistic fire. Every summer a tent is spread on the corner of Highland and West Streets under which the way of life is proclaimed. Roland A. Nichols preaches and Albert Bellingham leads the service of song. They are now in a meeting in which men and women are turning to the Lord. There is a Sunday-school under this tent of from a hundred and fifty to a hundred and seventy five. It looks as if a church might grow out of these tent meetings.

Bro. Nichols has remarkable ability in bringing persons to a decision. His converts, when he was in evangelistic work, were numbered by hundreds. His pastoral service is really evangelistic. There are conversions every week. The heart of this efficient young man is in the work of rallying men to the Christ. It will not surprise me to hear that he has broken over the restraints of the pastorate and is in the midst of an evangelistic

In a recent Christian Endeavor meeting in this church the following objections to missions and questions were considered. I jot them down that you may take them up and consider them in your society:

"Why not allow civilization to precede missions in order to lessen the expense of clearing the way and founding a station?"

'Are missions a failure?" "Which is most important-home missions or foreign?" "Ought we to give to missions when the home church needs the money?" "Should a Christian give to missions when he is in debt?" 'Ought a Society of Christian Endeavor to do something definite for missions?" "It costs too much to get a dollar to

Having just read with care and deep interest the booklet, "Public and Private Rights," by W. W. Hopkins, assistant editor of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, I wish to commend it to the earnest seeker after truth relating to many current issues of our American life and conditions. In this treatise Bro. Hopkins shows himself a logical thinker and a clear and forceful writer. His object is not so much the suggestion of methods of reform in connection with many popular abuses and evils, as the discovery of the underlying and structural principles upon which all reforms should proceed. He makes strong pleas upon "Fundamental Principles," "Fundamental Principles Illustrated," "Government in the Hands of the People" and "Money." His clear and lucid discussion of the money question is of itself worth many times the price of the little book (15 cents, or $10 per 100). I look upon the circulation of such literature as genuine missionary work at home, for this book breathes the very spirit and genius of the gospel of Christ. When you read it reflectively you will thank the author for writing it.

Bro. E. Ballou continues his good work of rescue at The House of Lord Mission, 146 Bleeker St., New York. He is being backed by a number of good men and women who help him in the services and also assist in the support of a little weekly paper, Good Tidings for You. It has much New Testament nomenclature in it which gives it the right ring. Nothing is said in its pages about "Sabbath services," "mourner's benches," getting "Holy Ghost power" and strange, miraculous conversion. The fact is, E. Ballou knows something about the beautiful simplicity of the New Testament and boldly teaches it in love. Consequently, his work is meeting with deserved success.

The arrangements are completed for the eighth annual conference of the Brotherhood of the Kingdom, which will be held at Marlborough, N. Y., early in August. The program promises many rich feasts; several series of discussions run through the daily program. The first theme of each day is "The prophets of Israel" (Micah, Hosea, Amos and Isaiah); the second is the "Modern Prophets" (George Fox, John Wesley, Frederick Dennison Maurice and John Ruskin); the third line of thought is "The Program of Christianity" (personal regeneration, church relations, missionary extension and social transfiguration), and these topics are followed relatively by discussion on The New Evangelism, The New Church, The Conscience and The New Discipleship. At four o'clock each day a conference will be held on such questions as Evangelism and Social Economics, Steps in Social Reform, Industrial Colonies and Farmers' Institutes and other matters of practical moment.

We had the pleasure of Bro. M. E. Harlan's presence at our service on Lord's day, July 22, and the displeasure of his refusal to preach. "Go preach" is his commission. He went (came) and sat down and would not preach. Remember Jonah and the whale! The only ground on which we can excuse him is that he was on his vacation. For a few days past he has been visiting places of interest about New York and next week intends to go to Boston by trolley cars, running from town to town on local lines. During the month of August all the services of the 169th St. Church and chapel will suspend except the midweek prayer-meetings. The suspension of services is not a wise thing ordinarily, but in this instance the church people mostly leave the city, so that it is difficult to maintain effective services. It is my hope to run away from metropolitan scenes in August and spend the time with my family and otherwhile friends in the good old states of Kentucky and Tennessee. The next New York Letter will in all probability be written from the capital of the bluegrass.

Dennisou is to have a knitting mill, the first in the state, to be known as the Gate City Hosiery Mill. The capacity to begin with is to be 100 dozen men's hose, 100 dozen ladies' hose and 100 dozen children's hose. And thus New England is coming down to Dixie and both New England and Dixie will be the better for the coming.

The death of Admiral John W. Philip has touched a tender chord in Texas. Our people were drawn to him because he commanded the "Texas" in the battle of Santiago, and displayed such magnificent courage and tender sympathy. When the Almirante Oquendo surrendered his soldiers began to cheer, when Capt. Philip stopped them by crying out: "Don't cheer boys; they are dying!" And after the fight the bugle sounded: "All hands on deck," and he said to his brave fellows: "I wish to make confession that I have implicit faith in God. We have seen what he has done for us in allowing us to achieve so great a victory; and I want to ask you all to uncover your heads with me and silently offer a word of thanks to God for his goodness toward us all."

And when the war was over he brought his battle scarred ship to Galveston, and the children of the state presented him a sword and a Bible. In the speech of acceptance he said: "I prize this sword, and am unable adequately to express my thanks. But for this priceless book what can I say? I prize it above the sword; I prize it FAR above the sword." No wonder that such a man is loved by us and by all the world.

The Providence Journal has turned prophet and says that in 1950 Texas will have outstripped both New York and Pennsylvania and will then be the most populous state in the Union. This is cortainly a safe prediction, and if things continue as they now are it would be safe to make the time limit 25 years earlier. Let us have a single fact in proof of this: In 1870 Dallas had a population of 1,700, in 1890, 38,000, and now we have 75 000; and it is the largest implement distributing center in the world, and within a radius of 100 miles we have 1,000,000 people, or more than one-third of the population of the state; and in this radius one eighth of the cotton of the United States is raised. And don't forget that Texas is almost 1,000 miles across from north to south and from east to west, and that the whole of it is prosperous.

The catalogue of the University of Texas is a handsome volume of 313 pages and contains much gratifying information about the school. It tells us that more than 1,000 students were enrolled during the last session; that the faculty numbers 89; that the students represent 150 counties, and that Dallas County leads in the attendance with 28 pupils.

"Public and Private Rights" is a neat booklet of 64 pages (15 cents), by W. W. Hopkins, Christian Publishing Company. Let us hear a word from the author: "However optimistic our view of the future, we cannot close our eyes to the fact that there are conditions of life extent in our civilization that no thoughtful, unselfish man can view without some feeling of indignation, resentment and alarm. . . . The rapid trend of the population from rural toward urban districts; the rapid trend of public and private lands toward fewer lords; the rapid centralization of wealth; the frequent labor troubles, low wages, strikes, lock-outs, shut-downs, enforced idleness and sweatshop horrors, are but the ominous signs of underlying forces which, if not arrested or Christianized, mean the overthrow of our nation They declare in unmistakable terms the existence of radical wrongs somewhere in our civilization, and to aid in the discovery and removal of these wrongs is the duty of every law-abiding citizen in the nation. . . It is an undeniable fact that our public lands have been squandered, our cities plundered of their franchises and other public possessions turned into private channels for private uses. . . . The land grants to railroad companies alone now amount to 215,000,000 acres, an area almost equal to eight states the size of Ohio. At a moderate price for farms this land would have more than paid the national debt at its highest point; or it would have built all the railroads for which they were given; or it would have given to every man, woman and child in the United States, upon the basis of the census of 1890, almost three acres of land.

"But the evil does not stop with land grants to railroad corporations. Vast acres of the public domain have been secured at a nominal cost by foreign capitalists for speculative purposes. The public records show that fifty six foreign corporations and persons now own 26,000,000 acres of land in the United States, of which 7,500,000 are owned by two Dutch syndicates, 1,800,000 by one English syndicate and 500,000 by one Scotch syndicate."

As a remedy for these and kindred wrongs the author presents the single tax theory and other leading ecomonic reform measures as solutions of these complex problems.

This liberal quotation, better than anything I could say, will give the reader an idea of the book. It shows the author to be dealing in a most vigorous manner with a practical and vita. question of the day; and those of us who know the man know him to be thoroughly honest in his work. The sooner we study this great question fairly and fully the sooner we will pass the danger point in our national life. Read this little book.

"I have had quite an experience with the use of coffee. Without knowing why, I gradually became seriously constinated, with all the disagreeable effects of this most aggravating disease. I was also bilious and stomach badly out of order.

"I had no idea of the cause and kept using coffee every morning.

"One day a friend, to whom I spoke of my troubles, remarked that perhaps I would find the cause in the coffee cup and suggested the use of Postum Cereal Food Coffee. I was impressed with his remarks and made the change from coffee to Postum. The old troubles have nearly disappeared and I am one of the happiest mortals you ever saw. I have proved to my entire satisfaction that coffee was the unsupected cause of the difficulty, and while it nearly ruined my health for a time I have practically recovered again by the discontinuance of coffee.

"I have known a number of persons who have been driven away from Postum because it came to table weak and characterless. It simply was not made right, and it would be the same with any other kind of drink, tea, coffee, cocoa, etc. Postum, when made according to directions, is a delightful beverage.

"There are a large number of people in this surrounding country who are using Postum, and their number increases daily. It is a sort of stampede. Store after store is putting in a stock of Postum that never thought of such a thing before.

Nebraska Leter.

Seeing that the Christian-Evangelist has no regular correspondent in Nebraska we will take it upon ourself to furnish the readers of the Christian-Evangelist the chief items of interest from time to time. The first thing we desire to say is that we like the Christian-Evangelist. Every issue of the paper is growing better. When the last number is perused one can hardly see how an improvement can be made; but invariably the next number will show an improvement over the last. May the Christian-Evangelist continue to grow better in the future as it has in the past, is the wish of one who could not do without the paper that brings the news and the truth.

The past year has been one of great blessing to our churches in Nebraska. I think that I am safe in saying that it has been the most prosperous in the history of our work in the state. Many excellent meetings have been held by evangelists and pastors, resulting in many accessions to the churches. Old church debts have been paid off, pastors secured for pastorless churches and churches that had ceased to meet have been revived and are again meeting after the appointments of the Word of God. This activity in church work is largely due to the increased material prosperity in the state. Times are good. Real estate is advancing Nebraska is having a real boom in material prosperity. While things are prosperous in the material world, the kingdom of God is also enjoring a season of growth and advancement. This is as it ought to be.

Now if the reader wants to learn anything or everything about Nebraska politics he can write to W. J. Bryan, Lincoln, Neb., and be satisfied; but if he wants to learn of our work in Nebraska. the work of the Churches of Christ, he can have his desires granted by writing to W. A. Baldwin, Ulysses, Neb. He is the wizard of our work. He has everything at his fingers' ends. For years he has served as corresponding secretary of our State Missionary Society. The most trying and protracted struggle ever passed through by our people in Nebraska has been the one of saving Cotner University. After the school was lost, sold to satisfy the creditors, and many of the men who had been looked to as leaders in saving the institution had left the state, a few faithful brethren met, under the leadership of Prof. W. P. Aylsworth, and devised plans by which the school could be saved. J. W. Hilton, an alumnus of the school, was selected as financial agent. Many said that he could not win against such great odds. He was a man full of faith and courage. He went forth to his task in the spirit of prayer and confidence. Difficulties that seemed mountain high began gradually to give way. Darkness gave place to light, defeat to victory. The commencement exercises of Cotner this year was a jubilee. The institution that seemed lost to us at one time was reclaimed. The occasion was a most happy one. Professors, students, members of the alumni and members of the churches were present to rejoice and sing the song of jubilee. B. J. Radford, of Eureka, Ill., was present to deliver the address on commencement day. His was an effort worthy of the occasion. In the afternoon A. D. Harmon, pastor of the Church of Christ at St. Paul, Minn., member of the class of '93, delivered the alumni address. It was a masterpiece of faultless eloquence. In Nebraska we are looking into the future full of hope and cheer.

Kansas Letter.

The state of Kansas is a fruitful mission field for those who are pleading for primitive Christianity. Here is a territory 200 miles wide by 400 long, more than twice the size of ancient Canaan during the reigns of David and Solomon when they ruled over all the land promised to Abraham.

Our work in the state is well organized; there are nine districts, each fully organized, and holding conventions annually.

In our state organization we have all the departments of the church under one board which holds monthly meetings at the office in Topeka. The presidents of the districts are members ex officio of the state board.

The plan of the board is to have three state evangelists who raise their salary in nearly every case in the field.

Besides, these there are two field workers; the superintendent of missions and the state organizer for the C. W. B. M. Mrs. McRogers is the organizer and is doing very efficient work organizing new anxiliaries and strengthening the ones already organized. She is almost constantly in the field.

The superintendent of missions during the time he has thus served, which is eight months, beginning November 1, has visited 70 different places, and counting those visited more than once, 100 places. He has traveled 10,259 miles, delivered 158 sermons and addresses, dedicated six houses, reorganized three congregations, organized four Bible-schools, raised for local church work $3,263, collected in the field for traveling expenses $234.69, and assisted in locating about 25 preachers.

Miss A. Rosalea Pendleton is the office secretary and treasurer. She attends to the correspondence and assists in editing the state paper, the Kansas Messenger. She toils early and late and is one of the most important factors in the state work.

We are now approaching the time for our state convention, which meets at Ottawa, Aug. 20-24. A splendid array of talent appears on the program, which will be published soon.

It now remains for the churches, Bible-schools and C. E. Societies to send in their offering for state missions without delay. We must raise about $1,200 by the time of the convention if we pay all bills and close the year out of debt, which must by all means be done.

We therefore urge our preachers to see that their churches have contributed to this fund for our own homeland, for above all things we should provide for preaching the gospel to those at our doors, and to assist these weak congregations whose very existence depends upon a little help. The board has no source of income except from the churches, the different departments of the church, and the individuals.

Let the responses be prompt and generous.

The water is beautiful and the fine farms on the hillsides, with orchards and buildings, fringed around with woods, make charming views all along the shores. Boats are on the water and the fisherman hunts the quiet places of the seaweed spots for bass, pickerel and muscalonge, while the boys row the girls in varnished boats or let gasoline engines do the work of the rower.

From Amphitheatre to Hall of Philosophy crowds pass our headquarters daily for an hour's lecture at one, then return for an hour at the other.

Parents rest while the children go to kindergarten or play in the sand along the lakeshore. Girls' club and boys' club and outlook have the attention of young people. Prof. Perry said some strong things in the lecture this afternoon upon the rights of man. That Kipling was wrong if Jefferson, Clay, Webster, Holmes and Whittler were right. The cheering of the audience told who was right, and the American idea stood for equal rights to all men.

Bro. Chas. L. Garrison, of Eminence, Ky., and P. H. Wilson, of Austintown, O., led communion service Sunday morning, and people from several states attended. M. J. Grable, of Cleveland, was with us at prayer-meeting, and Lloyd Darsie, of Paris, Ky., is to conduct services 10 A. M., Sunday.

She talked of the work in India and showed many curiosities in a meeting of ladies here yesterday. Egyptian corn, such as the Israelites found in Egypt, seemed strange to us, and yet it is common food in India.

Miss Krout, who went out to China as a newspaper correspondent, in a lecture to-day, claimed the war might have been averted if England and the United States had found an asylum for the young emperor. The objections of France, Russia and Germany could have been settled by arbitration, when they found that the emperor was not harbored, in the idea of occupying territory. Geo. T. Rand and A. M. Hootman, Tonawanda, N. Y., are here, also Mrs. Anna E. Talbott, Paris, Ky.; Mrs. T. W. Phillips, Newcastle; the Tabors from Buffalo, and many Disciples, and the Christian Evangelist has come. W. J. More About "A Cruel Accusation."

In last week's C.-E. (July 19) I read an article by Bro. J. J. Morgan with the above quotation as a caption. I do not think Bro. M. exhausts the subject by any means. I hear about the substance of that accusation frequenty nowadays, since affairs are so critical in China. People seem to instartly jump at conclusions and often those conclusions are erroneous. This is not a political or partisan question, but one which deserves the best thought of these perilous (to our people) times. In justice, too, to the best people on earth a fair hearing ought to be given to both sides before Christian missionaries are condemned. The world knows that China has treaty stipulations with this country which provide that our people under certain regulations can go there and stay indefinitely. Her people are here and we protect them with our laws. Is she protecting our people there when present conditions prevail? Is she faithful to that treaty? China's conditions brought to her shores these foreigners. China's own people are responsible for their presence there? The commercial spirit of her rwn people caused China to let the woole world into her ancient precincts, and then she was no longer exclusive, but must of necessity become a part of the world's progress, or in the nature of things get run over in the race of life among other nations. The great development of modern times has drawn the nations of the world so close together that all people are more or less heighbors, and all people are becoming more and more cosmopolitan. This is true to some little extent with the Chinese, for railroads, telegraphs and many other modern innovations of civilization have been introduced there. Now, somebody had to supply the requisite intelligence and mechanical skill to successfully put on foot these many enterprises there, and the Englishspeaking people, being at the front in such things, naturally were sought after and the result is that many of our race are there now. Mechanics, professional men, speculators, missionaries are there because China has taken some feeble steps along the line of modern progress. This is the case in a nutshell.

Our missionaries, if I catch their methods rightly, do not force the Christian religion on anyone. For the most part our missionaries who go there prompted by a most laudible desire to do good unto humanity, start out in gaining the acquaintance of the natives by doing some kind and gratuitous act towards them-cure them of some disease, as many of the missionaries are able physicians. This interests the lowly, oppressed and ignorant heathen and he wants to know more about his benefactors. Nothing strange about that. Religion being a natural prompting, he is interested in the Western man's religion. When John finds out that the sum and substance of the religion of the man of the Occident is just what has been done unto him, can you blame him for embracing it with even eagerness and alacrity? When the great principle of doing good crystallized into the gospel and personified in him that went about doing good is held up before the poor, needy and ignorant of the world, all else cannot stop them from flocking gladly to its standard.

Now, the world being a great cosmopolitan highway, thoroughfare, arena or scene of action, more and more linked together by that modern progress which it is impossible to check; and all people being neighbors to the extent of their coming in contact, from whatever cause, with each other, the parable of the "man who went down to Jericho" is a very apt illustration of the status of this missionary problem. Somebody is seen who fulfills the character of the "man" needing the sympathy and care of humanity. Many are they who, like the priest and the Levite, prefer to pass by on the "other side."

Address Pres. C. M. WILLIAMS, Liberty, Mo.

Dear reader, or critic, who are laying all the blame for this crisis in China on Christian missionaries, would you rather be found in the character of the priest and the Levite, or would you rather be likened unto the good Samaritan on life's highway? Is it not a noble calling and worthy of all commendation when people can discard all selfishness and freely and generously devote their lives to the good of others? Nowadays place cuts no figure and our missionaries are no more to blame for that than anybody else. It is impossible to set the world back and isolate nations, and facts must be dealt with as facts, not as theories. I hope and pray that this none-of-our-business theory may well be looked into before people criticise and find fault with the best people on earth.

Fifth District Notes.

The churches continue to neglect filling out report blanks. How long will it take our churches to learn a few simple, necessary lessons. Brethren, please attend to this matter at once.

Sangamon County expects to have every church contribute to state funds before next state convention at Bloomington in October. Why cannot other counties take up this matter in the same spirit?

We have several men who have offered their services for missionary meetings this fall. We have not yet decided where to send these men. I want to put the matter before the churches who will have to have the aid of a missionary meeting. I wish that all such churches in the district would please correspond with me at once, stating their condition and needs, and telling me when they want the meeting held. This will give us a better view of the field and we can make the best use of the men who have offered their services. One brother is ready to hold a meeting in August.

The churches of this town have been in a great union revival for four weeks, with 214 conversions up to date. The meeting may last a few days Williams and Alexander are conducting longer. Williams and Alexander are conducting the meeting. They are great workers for the Lord. Will report this meeting later.

Notes and News.

State Mission Notes.

How swiftly time flies! It seems but yesterday when we were in our state convention at Jefferson City, and now we are in the last two months before we meet again. The provicial program is out. We are sorry for some of the mistakes in spelling the names of those on duty, but the assistant secretary has been sick and the secretary has been so full of work that he left the proofreading to others with this result. This is his only excuse.

But that which concerns me the most is when I look over our books and see so many churches which have paid nothing as yet to our work. I am going carefully over this list of churches which have not yet responded to our appeal, and I am writing to the pastor of every such church. I am keeping the record of these letters and I am also going to record the answers, and it will be mighty interesting reading to see how many preachers there are in Missouri who can neither read nor write. This surely must be the reas n I get so few answers. It certainly cannot be that they are so discourteous or ungentlemanly as to refuse to answer a nice letter, such as I have written. No, no! I cannot believe that, nor vet that they have such little interest in Missouri missions. It can only be because they have not yet learned to read and write. It would surprise you if I were to tell you who they are; that, however, I cannot do. The secretary's desk and books hide many secrets that would astonish; but God alone, save those who keep the books, keeps the record of it all.

We have so increased our field force that our expenses largely exceed our income, and unless we can in some way secure the hearty co-operation of all the churches we cannot meet our obligations. I am saying to the preachers, if it is not possible to raise the full apportionment, please raise all you can, and if you can't do anything more you can preach a sermon on state missions and take an offering. There is no church so poor but what it can do this. How many will fail to do even this?

I have had published a slip entitled "State Missions Explained. All about it." I know it will be very helpful. I can send as many copies as a church can use. Let the preachers order all they need.

Ohio Notes.

On Sunday, July 22nd, I was present at the organization of the new church at Barberton, O. O. L. Cook has labored here for four weeks and the church is organized with a membership of 67. This membership is composed largely of those who have been members of our churches in other places and the nucleus for the new work is of the very best. A Sunday-school of about 70 has been organized and is growing rapidly. J. L. Deming, who graduated at Bethany College in June, has been employed by the Clark Fund trustees to be pastor of the church. The outlook is of the very brightest, though it will require earnest work to furnish the new church with a house of worship during the coming year. They will be compelled to worship in a hall until the church can be built.

Barberton is a town that was started less than ten years ago. To day there are between 6,000 and 7,000 people there, and houses for a couple of thousand are being erected this summer. It is a growth that is not for a day, but that will be permanent. No better mission field could be selected.

Our series of district conventions will begin August 8th in the 20th district at Grover Hill, and from that time down through Western Ohio and across the southern border and then coming to the northward again, there is one steady sweep of conventions, two each week, until the national convention. After the national convention the series is completed by five conventions in the northern part of the state. Programs have been sent out and the agitation in their interest has already begun. We trust that all people and all churches will take an active interest to make these conventions the best we have ever held in Ohio.

S. H. BARTLETT,

Cor. Sec. the Beckwith Franklin Circle. Cleveland, Ohio.

From Arizona.

Summer is here in all her tropical glory and the jingle of the iceman's saw is a welcome sound. Already the mercury has climbed up to 110° in the shade on the streets and to 100° in doors. But the total absence of moisture in the atmosphere renders the heat harmless and not oppressive. Almost every one sleeps out doors on cots during the summer and soon learn to enjoy it. There is no dew and rarely any breeze at night and a sky ordinarily devoid of cloads. One may make himself comfortable (comparatively) under the shade of an umbrella tree during the day or beneath the canopy of the heavens at night, but the heat of a church is intolerably oppressive. At least that must be the effect on the average Arizonian, judging from the audiences that great the city pastors during the summer months.

For several years past it has been the custom of the churches of Phenix to unite during July and August in union out-door services on Sunday nights, the several pastors taking turns in the preaching. This summer, however, it has been decided not to hold these union services, but to permit each church to do as it pleases. We shall probably arrange to hold out-door services in the evening on our own lawn, lighted by electricity. The regular morning services will be held inside.

Bro. and Sister Eugene Burr, who located in Temple last spring, are the busiest people in the valley now, as they are supplying two pulpits eight miles apart. Bro. Burr has been preaching for the Phœnix Church since May 1st, while Sister Burr supplied the Temple pulpit. On June 10th this arrangement will be reversed, Sister Burr preaching in Phœnix while her husband fills the Temple pulpit at 11 o'clock. We expect to continue this alternating service until Sept. 1st, when regular work will begin.

Bro. and Sister Burr have made many friends since coming in our midst, and we hope arrangements can be made that will permit them to remain permanently in this field where such energetic and talented laborers are so badly needed. To supplement the meagre salary which the little handful of brethren at Temple can pay, they are going to start a chicken ranch in the fall, and it will not be difficult to make this part of their income overbalance that received from the brethren, as it is a profitable industry here. Just at present the Phænix Church is in the slough of despond again.

We had arranged with Bro. A. B. Houze, of Riverside, Cal., to come to us on Sept. 1st, but his congregation begged so hard to have him stay and offered so many inducements that he repented and promised to remain, and now we are out in the cold "again. (That's only a figure of speech. It is hot enough to suit the most fastidious.) We are enacting the fable of the boys and the frogs again—the Riverside brethren representing the bad boys; we are the frogs.

Children's Day will be observed by our Sunday-school to-morrow. Our church, Sunday-school and Endeavor Society have taken offerings for both Home and Foreign Missions. We can't give much, but we can show the missionary spirit.

Five took membership with us by letter last Sunday. We have lost several of our best workers by removal this spring.

District Convention.

The first district convention of the state of Kansas was held at Nortonville, June 26-29, and was well attended. It was the best convention ever held in the district. No pains were spared by the president, Bro. Moore, of Reserve, and Sister M. C. Rogers, district manager of the C. W. B. M., to prov de an excellent program. Those outside of the distric and who took part on the program were W. F. Richardson, of Kansas City, S. T. Martin, of Omaha, Neb., and our b-loved and untiring state superintendent, W. S. Love. The brethven at Nortonville entertained their guests in a royal manner. The convention meets next year with the church at Valley Falls. D. T.

Report from First District in Illinois.

NOTES.

The thirty-second annual convention of the first district was held in Stering, Ill., June 21-24.

There were over 190 delegates present from other churches.

Frank G. Tyrrell, of Chicago, gave tone and inspiration to the convention on Thursday evening; subject: "The Dawn."

The general report showed 418 additions to the 17 churches, or an increase of 40 per cent. Every church in the district save one has regular preaching.

We suffer the loss of D. R. Lucas, leaving Rockford.

Anna M. Hale gave a helpful and inspiring address to the C. W. B. M. ladies. H. G. Bennet, of Monroe, Wis., preached the Endeavor sermon: "The Contribution of the Christian Endeavor to Our Plea." J. Fred Jones, the indispensable, unconventional man of conventions, was there giving an address and preaching on Sunday morning. D. R. Lucas was there to counsel and instruct and entertain. Pres. R. E. Hieronymus represented the educational work of the state in a splendid address.

By permission of the sate board the first district uses the money raised for state work within this district. Fulton, Tampico and Rockford are its mission points. Fulton and Rockford are looking for suitable men to take charge of the work.

Z. T. Sweeney will preach here in the assembly ground Sunday, July 15, and lecture on Monday evening. Finis Idleman, Dist. Sec.

Iowa Notes.

Our state convention will meet in Des Moines, Sept. 3-7. The program is in preparation and will be announced in due time.

We are building houses and establishing congregations in eight county seats and in eight smaller towns this year. The buildings represent $50.000 in money.

In addition to this we have had six evangelists in the field and have helped to sustain six pastors with mission churches.

Thus far only about one-half of the Iowa churches have assisted in this work. I cannot see how preachers and churches can have the heart to fail to co-operate in a work like this. I do not believe that you could expect better results.

We have been compelled to reduce our evangelistic force in the face of many open doors. Why do you witdhold your support and keep us waiting? Three-fourths of the year is gone, but if all will swing into line we will win a great victory for Christ.

Evangelist Ed. Hastings is at Washington, endeavoring to raise sufficient subscription to erect a church building.

Lawrence Wright is at Waterloo in the hardest battle of his life. The building is finished and all arrangements are made to make it financially secure. When this is done we will see what can be done to rally the members.

Jno. Williams has located with the church at Whiting.

Hugh Morrison will preach at Eldora during vacation.

Prof. Clinton Lockhart has located at University Place and preached for the brethren at Morgan Valley at the opening of their new church last Lord's day.

Your secretary will dedicate the church at Kamrar the 15th inst. We spent last Lord's day at Long Grove.

CHRISTIAN PUBLISHING COMPANY, ST. LOUIS.

The churches of Scott and Clinton counties united in a basket meeting in the grove near the old church. It was one of the best meetings that I ever attended. The preachers present were C. C. Davis, Davenport, W. E. Jones, pastor at Long Grove, and Cointon Abey, of De Witt.

It was refreshing to meet with such men as Father Meredith, A. W. Brownlee and James Eldredge. These men have stood by the cause in that part of the state for 50 years. Long Grove is one of the oldest congregations in the state.

The old log house in which Bro. McConnell preached 50 years ago is still standing.

The collection for state work amounted to $24.74. We will send out cards next week. See that the blank is filled out and returned promptly. We want our books to show a complete record of the work done by every congregation in the state. Last week we sent a letter to each Endeavor Society of the Christian Church in Iowa. We enclosed a form for an "Iowa Excursion," an evening entertainment for the Endeavor Society to give as a benefit for Iowa missions. We may have failed to reach some societies. If it has not been presented to you let me know and another copy will be sent to you. The entertainment as outlined is interesting and unique and we think it would be profitable for any society as well as the B. S. DENNY, Cor. Sec.

God's People in a New Home.

The Northeast (formerly Second Christian) Bible-school held their first session in the chapel leased from the Seventh-day Adventists, June 3rd. The school was fairly well attended considering the change of location, while the Junior C. E. meeting and the evening preaching service was largely attended, and yielded ten new names to the Juniors, and six additions to the church; four by confession and two reclaimed. Brethren, is not this a grand work and does it not appeal to you.

We feel "greatly encouraged to press on, and will soon have a live, smooth, working church organization, and will inaugurate a vigorous campaign against sin.

Thursday night of each week will be devoted to the study of the Bible and a short devotional service.

We earnestly ask the great brotherhood to pray for the success of this great work.

The Tribune family are doing very well. Quite a number have responded to our appeal, while there are yet thousands which we hope to hear from whose hearts we know are in the work. Will you please send your response in the future to the N. E. Christian Church, W. A. Dress, Treas., 1314 Green St., Reading, Pa.

Sullivan's Great Day.

DEAR BRETHREN:—Sunday, July 22nd, was a day long to be remembered in the history of the Christian Church in Sullivan, Ill. It was the day we entered our new house of worship. The sun rose in a clear sky; the day was almost perfect. Bro. Z. T. Sweeney arrived the day before and had all of the preliminaries perfectly arranged.

The house is a model of beauty and convenience; it contains five rooms, four of which can be thrown into one, and will then seat nearly one thousand people. The structure is brick with stone trimmings and slate roof. It is heated with steam and lighted with electricity. It is beautifully frescoed and seated with elegant pews; the acoustics are almost perfect. Also it contains an excellent pipe organ.

During the morning discourse the audience was carefully counted by the chief usher, and it was found that there were present nearly one thousand people. The building cost, not including the organ, about $11,000, all of which had been raised but $4,600, and after a masterful sermon Bro. Sweeney asked for money to pay the debt and more than $5,000 was raised. In the evening he delivered one of the ablest discourses ever given in the city, after which the building was formally given to God.

On Monday evening he gave his great lecture on "The Golden Age," which was [regarded a masterpiece. It has been my pleasure to have been present on many such occasions with different ones of our brethren, all strong men, but I do not hesitate to say that Bro. Sweeney is the prince of them all. He is the ablest man among as for such a work.

The church in Sullivan is blessed with some of the best people in the world; I would be pleased to mention some names, but I [would not know where to stop. Bro. Sweeney said of the pastor: "On two different occasions I have assisted Bro. E. W. Brickert in the opening of two houses of worship for congregations where he was pastor. On both occasions I found two spiritual congregations, full of faith and good works, which was undoubtedly traceable to the activity, zeal and efficiency of the pastor and his good influence. His scholarly attainments and ability as a preacher have been subjects of general comment, and his Chr.stian character and integrify have always been gladly recognized."

We are trusting in the Lord, working hard and expecting a glorious victory in a great ingathering. Pray for us. MRS. E. W. BRICKERT.

The Disciples' Divinity House.

The wisdow and farsightedness of those who inaugurated the Divinity House in connection with the University of Chicago are being every year vindicated. No effort has thus far been made to secure it upon an enduring financial basis. Its scholastic work has gone quietly on and it has been exerting a steady and far reaching influence without financial equipment.

The money that has been needed to carry on the work has been supplied by friends close to the enterprise. The demands of the House for instruction has been met by a few who received their support from other sources. Thus far not a man who has been actually connected with the work of the House has received compensation for his work. On the other hand they have contributed out of their own means for the incidental expenses.

The time has come now when its needs cannot be satisfied by the fragments of time given by men out of their regular work in other lines. It demands the undivided time and thought of at least two men. To meet this demand and support these men the trustees of the House are going to the brotherhood of the Disciples at large for endowment. There is need at once of an endowment fund of $50,000 to support one man and meet the expenses of administration. The House is already in possession of one of the choicest corner lots, 100x170 feet, across the street from the University of Chicago, which is worth $20,000, on which there is a mortgage of $7,000. On one end of this lot the Hyde Park Church of Christ has built a house of worship at a cost of $7,000. The church would not now be in a home of its own but for the favor of the Divinity House in giving it ground on which to build. The Divinity House has also received by bequest a part of the estate of the late John P. Davis, which will be available upon the death of one of the present beneficiaries for a memorial building in which to carry on the work. The bequest will realize $50,000. Hitherto the authorities of the university have granted the House the use, free of charge, of one lecture room in Haskell Museum, the theological building, and besides has given the use of a room in the Divinity Dormitory for Disciples' headquarters. Never before was the demand for a Disciples' Divinity building so pointedly emphasized as during the present summer term. Many of our 40 students who are here have been unable to find rooms in the university building and have been obliged to seek rooms at a distance and at a higher rate of expense. This will not be remedied until the building is erected.

Chicago University is bound to be the center of theological and graduate study for the entire brotherhood of the Disciples. For the last three years there have been no less than 75 students in attendance in all the departments of the university from Disciple homes. All of our colleg-s but one are represented here this summer in their graduates. Many have sent their professors.

Winfield (Kansas) Chautauqua Assembly.

For fourteen years Winfield has had a Chautau qua. This year the Disciples were well an strongly represented. In the educational department Profs. Willett and McClintock delighted th people every day. Biblical and literary topic were discussed. One good Presbyterian remarke to the writer: "I think Dr. Willett is the life this assembly. He is one of your kind, but hi ideas of the Bible just suit me." They have heard him five years. He grows in favor.

The president of the Chautauqua Circle said t the writer after hearing Prof. McClintock: "Thi to me is the best of the whole business."

Z. T. Sweeney and Champ Clark were on th lecture platform and won laurels. The director after the assembly decided to recall three of th lecturers, Dr. Sweeney being one.

Referring to the war in China, one man, wh was led to make his first contribution to Foreig: Missions last March, said that he would give not more because the missionaries caused the war it. China. That suggested some summer evening discourses on "China," "Japan," "India." Some points:

- 1. If the missionaries had hever gone the foreigners would be in China.
- 2. The hellish opium war was in direct corflict with everything held dear by the missionary
 - 3. The missionary relies on persuasion.
- 4. There is no specific for the troubles of China outside the lids of the New Testament.
- 5. He who created China and the United States commands the missionary to go. He has no option if loyal to his king.

Has any one tried tabernacles meetings in howeather, in towns of five to ten thousand, pitching the tabernacle in portions of the town removed from the church a mile or so? If so, report. We are feeling our way. Bro. Wright, o Waterloo, Ia., has good plans for the tabernacle the imperative necessity is a good plan to raise the money to raise the tabernacle to raise the devil. Yes, for a Christian ought to get near the devil sometimes in order to hit him hard.

TEXAS.

Gainesville, July 10.—The Scoville-Wilson revival recently closed with the Dixon St. Chris-tian Church of this city was the greatest meeting tian Church of this city was the greatest meeting so far as I know ever held in one of our Texas churches. It was great in the number led to the Savior, 212. It was great from the standpoint of the influence and prominence of the persons reached, leading men from the walks of business, from the professions, from the county and even district offi ials. It was a common remark: "I never saw so many strong men and women turn-ing to the Lord." It was great in the zeal and earnestness it provoked among our religious neighbors. They straightway got together, built neighbors. They straightway got together, built a tabernacle, sent for their chief evangelist and went to work with a fervor and zeal and unity hitherto unknown. And they are still at it. It was great in the preparation made for it. For months the most thorough arrangements were made in every possible way. It was great in the amount and constancy of the work done by the machine. amount and constancy of the work done by the members. Almost every service for 36 days they attended. They had a mind to work and pray and not grow weary. It was great in the number of people instructed. Nearly half the time we occupied a great tabernacle which accommodated 3,000 people and was often crowded. Thus the city has heard our plea. It was great financially. Every bill was paid, the evangelists given all they would take, and nearly $200 left in the treasury. Some pledged as much as $1 per day for the meeting. It was great in the use of printer's ink. We supplied every daily paper with from one to four columns daily. About every other day an announcement card or ticket was gotten out, with a doctrinal tract in the other side and there are track breadest over the silve. In every way with a doctrinal tract on the other side and these scattered broadcast over the city. In every way we used the iron preacher. It was great in music. A chorus of 50 voices were drilled beforehand for the work. Bro. J. Walter Wilson was musical director. In that line and as a soloist he probably has no superior in the brotherhood. It was great in gospel preaching. Not only is Chas. Reign Scoville a great organizer and worker; he is also a great preacher—perhaps not pre-Chas. Reign Scoville a great organizer and worker, he is also a great preacher—perhaps not preeminently so in any one respect, but symmetrical and strong in an all-round sense. Originality large faith, pathos, logic, tact, education, simplicity, versatility, boundless energy and immeasurable earnestness—these are some of the characteristics of the man. It is not in his make-up to think of failing. He spares not himself, but throws as much vitality, force and fire into one sermon as some preachers would into forty. His work is on a high plane, reaching the best people. He is true to the Book—all the Book. We thank God for this wonderful revival. Our church now numbers nearly 700. Pray for us.—J. B. SWEENEY. SWEENEY.

NO STATE GIVEN.

During my pastorate of two years at Knoxville there have been 91 additions to the church; 50 by there have been 91 additions to the church; 50 by baptism, 11 reclaimed, seven by letter, 23 from various denominations. We raised about $95 and paid a debt that was hanging over the church; paid $6 to foreign missions, $5 to home missions, $17 to Christian Orphans' Home, $t. Louis, $Mo, $6 for state work. Held three weeks' meeting at Dallas, additional work with 30 additions in all to the Dallas church; 20 by baptism, 10 from other churches. Additional work at Pleasant Ridge, two baptisms, one reclaimed, total 124 additions, besides 40 marriages and 53 funerals. We have frescoed the interior of our church making it frescoed the interior of our church making it frescoed the interior of our church making it beautiful and attractive, and can say as I go from them, they paid their pastor every dollar that was coming to him. May the spirit exemplified by the divine Teacher rule and reign in their hearts until we all meet where there will be no parting. One baptism Saturday and one confession Lord's day evening.—JAMES C. NOVA SCOTIA.

Halifax, July 16.—We have just closed au excellent meeting with the church in this city, Bro. A. Martin, of Muncie, Ind., doing the preaching. The immediate results are three added by baptism, the little church greatly revived and encouraged and others left studying the Scriptures to see "whether these things were so." There were four confessions in all, but one lady has not been baptized yet, having been kept back by family and sectarian influence. The little church in Halifax has hear greatly weakened in the last two years by tarian influence. The little church in Halifax has been greatly weakened in the last two years by the removal of so many of its members, having lost by death and removals from the city fully 50 from the church and congregation. We could not look for many additions, as there were but few in our congregation who were not already in the church; but many have heard our plea for the first time and I am confident that some in the near future will be found among the sayed. the near future will be found among the saved. One grand result of this meeting is the spiritual uplift the church has enjoyed, having their knowledge of the Scriptures greatly increased and their fath strengthened. Bro. Martin has a warm place in all our hearts and will receive a warm welcome if at any time he can again visit the little church in Halifax.—E. C. FORD

It is not given me to know

The dark and light of years to be—
What clouds shall frown upon the land,
What tempests sweep the sea.
But this I know, that soon or late
I'll pass within the jeweled gate
That "stands ajar for me."

It is not given me to see

My pathway clear and bright;
My feet may tread a lonely way,

That darkens into night.
Yet, after every night is day,
Beyond grim winter blooms the May.
I'm traveling toward the light.

God set the flaming sun on high
To fill my days with light.
He flung the stars acr ss the sky
As sentinels of night.
As long as shipe the lighted skies
My song and prayer to Him shall rise
For all His love and might.

My Lord, who dared the night of sin
To save a lamb astray,
Will gladly help me when I cry,
For he taught me to pray.
So, whether it be dark or light,
Full well I know that earth's last night
Will brighten into day.

GRACE COHEA.

Twilight was just changing into dusk. The narrow streets of the city were already dark. The heat had been unusually oppressive that day and now the people had sought the housetops for the refreshing cool of the evening. The solitary occupant of one roof is a young man, low of stature and of no external beauty. He could be considered a very ordinary young man except for the strong personality which cannot escape the notice even of a passing glance. A strong character, a resolute will and undaunted courage are expressed in every line about the eves, mouth and forehead. By his dress we recognize him to be of the higher castesin fact, he is a member of an aristocratic family, a student and a highly cultured young man.

Had his mind been free he might this evening have beheld Jerusalem more beautiful than ever the sun saw it. The deepening dusk has rendered the outlines of the buildings all around so indistinct that the houses seem to merge into each other, while here and there is a garden, and beyond the mountains rise in black relief against the gray evening sky. A feeling of awe would steal over an observer as he views their imposing grandeur. Yet, he would be filled with a sense of security as he sees them standing round like giant body guards protecting the holy city. But Saul sees none of this. He saw not the blazing sky in the path of the sun as it sank from sight, watched not the restless changing of shape and position of these clouds, nor the harmonious blending of colors; he sighed not when they finally faded from sight; he sees not the stars as they gradually make their appearance; he hears not the soft, sweet tones of a harp from a neighboring housetop, nor the low murmur of voices from the court below him; feels not the gentle breezes as they fan his burning brow. He sees only the synagogue, fair and beautiful; sees many angry faces; sees one man, pale yet calm, perfectly selfpossessed and confident; sees the threatening nods and gestures among the angry men and the suspicious glances cast upon the one poor man; he hears angry words, rash statemen's and harsh accusations; hears his own voice raised in condemnation of this man. because he persists in declaring that one who had been crucified was the Son of God, and that God had raised him from the dead. He is baffled. He is angry because he can neither suppress his opponent, though he takes the precedence over all his colleagues in the argument, nor make him angry or even lose his self-control enough to give them a legal right to punish him. Saul is now honestly endeavoring to solve the problem of what is to be done, but finds it hard to concentrate his mind. Pictures of the day's events are continually before his eyes; he is chargined because one Christian has defeated the best wisdom of the Jews. He is mortified because he is unable to defend the teachings which from his childhood he has tenderly reverenced, and which he believes most enthusiastically. Again, his student nature will not allow him to ignore argument which he cannot deny, though he will not accept it. Then the face of Stephen seems to rise before him as plainly as he had seen, it in the afternoon. Its calm repose mocks him; its sincerity makes him quake; its confident assurance maddens him. He rises and paces the roof in his agitation, then decends to his chamber with the thought: "If only he could be made to blaspheme we would have him!" He tosses upon his couch until in his weariness he cries out: "Oh! my God, show me thy truth!" and sleep relieves him of his burden.

In the morning he wearily arises and sits down to ponder over the problem again. It seems more complicated than it had the night before. His mind is not clear, his slumber had been disturbed by unpleasant dreams. As he leaves his apartments he repeats audibly the thoughts of the night before: "If only he could be made to blaspheme!" Then he goes straight to a leading member of the Sanhedrin and after some conversation says: "If only he could be made to blaspheme!" Saul went about seeking others with whom to consult, but the mischief is done and poor Stephem is doomed. It was not a hard may ter for that haughty dignitary with whor Saul had spoken to find an Asiatic Jew wh had been present at the Passover when Jesu was crucified, and who remembered wit what success the charge of blasphemy wa brought against him for saying that h would rebuild the temple in three day without hand, and who also remembered tha in the synagogue Stephen had quoted tha same expression in his argument with then The Jew of Asia at once became the willing tool of the Jerusalem Jew. Each goes hi way, the one to summons the council, the other to find others of his sect to bear wit ness to his accusation.

It is almost the seventh hour and all thing are ready for the trial. Saul, burning fo revenge and outraged at Stephen's apparen sacrilege, though forgetful of his weight words, has entered heartily into the prepa rations and his quick mind and unflagging energy have placed him at the front. The Asiatic Jews are sent to search out Stephen They find him in his customary place, in the Cilician synagogue, speaking words of wis dom and mercy, performing miracles and working wonders, himself the personification of godliness. They ruthlessly drag him through the dirty streets past the market place toward the council chamber, being joined at every turn by idlers, hungry fo so mething exciting, whether just or unjust At the end of this parade he is hurried int a large room with a raised seat at one end on which sits Theophilus, the high priest and president of the council, sordid as a statu of Mars. As he enters 71 faces, arranged in a semicircle around Theophilus, frown upor him. Back of these, and to the left, stand: number of men, among whom Stephen see only one face. Vengeance is stamped upor it. It is the face of Saul. He knows him to be a man of strong convictions, of read mind and prompt in action, and he yearns for his soul. To the right are his accusers, whose every movement speaks their impatience Outside he hears the jeers of the curiou mob, but Stephen is not afraid. He is sur of God's approva! of his life and actions.

As he approaches Theophilus points hin to a seat, then calls for the charlge. "He blasphemes! he blasphemes!" comes from his excited accusers, "for we have heard him ay that this Jesus of Nazareth shall destroich his place and shall change the customs de ivered unto us by Moses" The cry is take up by all in the room and is echoed by those without. Theophilus turns to him, saying "Are these things so?" Stephen arises de erately and all eyes are upon him; he lifts s eyes to heaven in a hurried prayer for rength and guidance. His answer comes d the glory in his soul shines out in his ce until all in the room see that it shines te the face of an angel. In his defence he hearses the history of Israel, bringing out e progress of the earlier Jews, and showg that the present conservatism must be ercome. By Illustrations he proves that od is not confined to the temple. He pauses d looks into their faces. The feeling is trelenting, but is intensified rather. They ill not listen to his reason, and in anguish spirit he cries out: "Ye stiffnecked and circumcised in heart and ears, ye do alays resist the Holy Spirit; as your faths did, so do ye!" This met with bitterest sentment and gnashing of teeth. He can y no more, they will not be convinced. gain looking up he sees a vision of Jesus anding by the right hand of his Father, is face aglow with tenderest sympathy.

Stephen is consoled and reveals his vision his waiting audience. Saul can restrain mself no longer. With a cry he rushes on him, followed by the others, with all the shemence of enraged beasts. Again, Stephen dragged through the streets of Jerusalem a little hill without the city wall where is stoned to death, the persecutors received their instructions from Saul, who also olds their garments until all is over.

Again, when the sun has gone down and he cool of the evening replaces the overwering heat of the day, we find Saul upon e housetop. Again he is thinking over the ay's events. Stephen's speech, though uneeded in his passion, has not been forgotten, nd now he thinks it through. Following ep by step God's leadings of Israel, he sees ne reasonableness of Stephen's conclusions. is mind reverts to the scene without the ty, and he again sees Stephen's angelic ice and godly demeanor. Suddenly he ears, as it were, in audible tones: "Lord, y not this sin to their charge!" He starts p. "Sin! sin! was it a sin?" Now his ind goes back to Tarsus. He reviews his tire life. He certainly had always done hat he thought to be right. He thinks of l he has learned at home from his devout arents; in his mingling with the Greeks and omans in his native province, and in Jerudem from the wise though conservative amaliel. His conscience is clear. Then thinks again of Stephen's address and is oubled. "Could he be right and I be wrong? h, my God, show me thy truth!"

The days following were filled with restss activity for Saul. With untiring energy and his party hunted down the Christians the city. Many flee to escape him. He ops not till there is not another to be und. He receives many impressions durg these days, but has little time to medite. Some of his victims submit helplessly, pities them; some denounce their faith, scorns them; some resist and argue the se, he dispatches them in disgust; some ear their persecution bravely but meekly, less cause him a pang of conscience. He ss committed numbers to prison, both men and women, many to torture, some even to death. His zeal has become an ambition. Enthusiasm runs high among his followers. The city is in a tumult. He can do no more in Jerusalem; it has been the work of a few days and the Roman government has tolerated it, but it cannot last long. Saul thinks of Damascus as the next place of attack. Many Christians have escaped thither, and that city is under an Arabian prince who caters to the Jews, and there is, therefore, no danger of civil interference. Thinking is action with him, and he is in the presence of the high priest asking for letters permitting him to go to Damascus to seek out the refugees and bring them again to Jerusalem

It takes about ten days to make the journey as they are forced to go. Saul is riding in a litter on a camel; part of his company are mounted, ut most of them walk. The highway is rough and stormy and the reflection of the noonday sun is so intolerable as to compel them to stop for a while each day, but they travel far into the night to hasten the journey as much as possible. They pass many cities and villages, climb mountains, cross rivers and pass through fig and olive groves, but the beauty of the country is lost upon this caravan. As the days go by Saul becomes impatient for the end of the journey. He is exhausted physically with the strain of the past month's work, and is weakened by exposure to the intense heat of the sun, and, too, he is worried with his own thoughts. It is the first opportunity since the martyrdom of Stephen that he has had for serious reflection upon his course of conduct, and his mind is more confused than

Throughout the journey the saintly face of Stephen has haunted him, and continually he hears the dying man's last words: "Lay not this sin to their charge!" Over and over he has prayed in his unrest of heart: "Oh, my God, my God, show me thy truth!" At length he orders the caravan not to stop for the usual noon rest. On the tenth day, about midday, when the heat is most oppressive, they come in sight of the city. It is situated about half a mile distant in a very fertile valley about 1,000 feet below them. The valley is bordered on the opposite side by mountains and dotted with orchards of plum, fig, apricot, olive and other trees. From among these rise the domes of Damascus, one of the most beautiful cities of the world at that time, but its only impression on Saul is a sense of relief. Suddenly the entire company is dazed by an exceedingly bright light, brighter than the nooday sun, and they all fall to the earth. Saul at once recognizes it as a vision from Jehovah, and looking up at its source, sees a shining angel and hears a low pathetic voice saying in mingled tenderness and rebuke: "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" "Who art thou Lord?" was the most natural question. the same gentle tones the answ r comes: "I am Jesus, whom thou persecutest." It is enough; Saul is at once his willing servant: "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" The three days of darkness which followed gave Perfect and Upright.

C. H. WETHERBE.

Of Job the Bibie says: "And that man was perfect and upright." Now, when we are told by some persons that there never was a perfect man on earth, except Christ, we may confidently point to Job and say that the Bible pronounces him to have been a perfect man. And yet the Bible does not say that he did not commit any sin. Nor has any one any divine authority for even inferring that he was entirely free from the commission of sin. I am aware that those who maintain that it is quite possible for Christians to get into a state in which they do not commit any sin, claim that Job was in such a state, and they quote the words which I have presented as a proof that he did not commit any sin. But the word "perfect," as applied to Job, does not by any means signify a state of sinlessness. Now I ask, Why is the word "upright" used in connection with the word "perfect," in describing Job's character? If he were perfect in the sense of being entirely free from committing sin, would he not have been necessarily upright? Most certainly. The man who is so perfect that he does not commit any sin must also be thoroughly upright in all of his ways and works. This truth needs no argument to substantiate it; it is self-evident. And does not the fact that the word "upright" follows the word "perfect" show that the latter word cannot possibly mean that Job did not commit any sin? Certainly. What, then, is meant when it is said that Job was both perfect and upright? It evidently means that he was wholehearted in his love and service for God., He was thoroughly sincere, which is moral perfectness. His whole soul was leyal to God; hence he was perfect. He was completely devoted to God; this is the perfection of consecration to God. These are the main meanings of the word "perfect" as applied to Job, and they have primary reference to his relation to God. Then, too, he was "upright," and this has reference to Job's practical relation to his fellowmen. The two go together. Job was upright in his dealings with his fellows. He was thoroughly, sincerely honest in attitude and act toward all with whom he talked and dealt. And I do not hesitate to say that he who is not thoroughly upright in all of his transactions with others is not perfect in his attitude towards God, it matters not how strongly and frequently he may declare that he is perfect in love. Perfection of love towards God involves such a perfection of love towards one's fellowmen that he will habitually treat them honorably, fairly, kindly, candidly, and hence he will not take any advantage of their necessities nor weaknesses. The Christian who is both perfect and upright is a mighty moral force in society.

Omitting Your Breakfast.

The editor of the Christian-Evangelist has not only greatly promoted his own health by omitting his noonday lunch, but he has largely benefited the public by publishing the fact with favorable comments.

Edward Hooker Dewey, M. D., of Meadville, Pa., is known almost throughout the world as the author of the "No-Breakfast Plan," His most admirable book, "True Science of Living," gives the undoubted true physiology upon which this largely and rapidly growing custom rests. His new book, "The No-Breakfast Plan," will soon be off the press. He is a writer of remarkable clearness and power. There is not a dull sentence in anything he writes.

All food taken into the stomach must be digested and assimilated or eliminated, or else remain in the body as waste and foreign matter, a clog to the system, a hindrance to its vital functions, a promoter of diseased action and an obstacle in the way

The human brain is the dynamo of the body. In its cells in a state of repose and sleep is generated and collected and stored up the vital force that runs this human machine, including the digestion of food and the elimination of the waste.

The physiological purpose of taking focd into the stomach is to supply the waste of the body due to its activity during waking hours. The digestion of food and the elimitation of the waste is a tax on the vital force. All that one eats above that required to supply the waste of tissues is a tax on the brain, a depletion of the vital force at the expense of power needed for brain work and muscle work through the day. If one spends his vital force, his brain power, in disposing of unneeded food one must suffer from a lack of power to do his usual brain work and physical labor. When a dray horse is overloaded, he balks and refuses to pull. When the brain power is overtaxed by constantly overloading the stomach with too large and too frequent meals the brain, not being able to carry the load, ceases its effort to digest, makes the person sick, takes away the appetite and proceeds to an effort to eliminate the accumulated waste matter by what we call disease or sickness.

There is no greater fallacy than that we must eat to "support the strength," to "sustain vitality." We eat to furnish material with which the vital force, the life power, can build and repair the body. More than is necessary for this purpose is an unnecessary task on the life power at the expense of brain and muscular labor. Man does not live by bread alone, as Jesus said. The life power existed before bread, and it exists independently of it. The speck of living matter, called a cell, from which our bodies came, was formed into a body by the life power which appropriated the food supplied and built the body. The food we eat furnishes the materials of which the body is built and with which it is repaired, but it does not furnish the life power.

Sleep is not a hunger-producing cause. During sleep the body becomes relaxed and ceases all activity save that which is necessaro to carry on the vital functions. The objective brain becomes inactive and unconscious. Less blood flows to the brain in sleep and the heart beats less frequently. The morning hunger is one of habit, as the toper's thirst is one of habit, and not a physiological demand for food to supply the waste of tissues. Food taken into the stomach at the breakfast hour must be eliminated at the expense of brain power needed for brain work or muscular work until a demand for food has been created by exercise. Dyspepsia is the cry of the intelligent life power against too many meals in the day, against too great a demand on its supplies.

I took medicine nearly every day for many years and was never well. Since I learned how to live I have taken no medicine and am well and strong. I have taken no medicine for several years. We never set the breakfast table in our house any more. It has not been spread in two years. None of my family eat breakfast. The morning hours that I used to spend in dozing over my books, I now spend in real study with a clear brain and mental grasp I never knew in all the wasted years of the vulgar habit of eating a breakfast my system did not need. I worked fourteen hours a day all last winter and never ate a breakfast. My little daughter goes to school every day without her breakfast. We have no sense of hunger till noon. We are well. Our life power is expended in accomplishing our work, and not in disposing of unneeded and injurious meals. I eat as much as ever before, because I miss no meals by sickness. I eat with a relish now and digest well, and am stronger than ever before because I do not waste my life power in disposing of unneeded and injurious food and drink.

I commend what the editor says about omitting his lunch. I should add that my family, wife and daughters, are greatly reieved of drudgery in the kitchen. They now have time for some intellectual pursuits, and a taste for them they could not have when they spent all their time in kitchen cooking and eating. There is m to this life than baking and cooking stuffing. DR. J. L. PARSONS

J. BRECKENRIDGE ELLIS.

In the meantime poor Prince Giglio had en lying very sick in his chamber, though took all the horrible medicines like a ood young lad, as I hope you do, my dears, hen you are ill and mamma sends for the ctor. And the only one who visited Gigwas Rosalba, the little maid. He used to y, "Rosalba, how is the Princess Angela?" And Rosalba would answer, "Very ell, my lord." And Giglio would sigh and ink, "If Angelica were sick, I should not well!" At last he began to mend, and e day he dressed and went down stairs, nen whom should he meet but Angelica? I the covers were off the chairs, and the ndsomest albums on the tables. Angelica d her hair in papers. In a word, it was ident there was going to be a party.

Giglio!" cries Angelica; "you here in such dress! What a figure you are!"

"Yes, dear Angelica, I feel so well to-day, anks to the jelly."

What do I know about jellies that you alde to them in that rude way?" says Angel-

"Why, didn't-didn't you send it, Angel-

"I send it, indeed! Angelica, dear!" says e, mocking him. "I was getting the oms ready for his Royal Highness, Prince albo, who is coming to pay papa a visit." Giglio said: "Oh, Angelica, I didn't think is of you. This wasn't your language to e when I gave you my ring in the garn-"

Angelica in a rage cried: "Rude creature! s for your trumpery ring, there, sirere!" And she flung it out of the window. ow Angelica little knew that the ring was fairy ring; if a woman wore it, it made I the gentlemen in love with her.

"Very good!" says Giglio, his eyes flashg fire; and then as if his eyes had been ddenly opened, he cried out: "Ha! what es this mean? Is this the woman I have en in love with all my life? • Have I been ch a ninny? Why—actually—you—you e a little crooked!'

"Eh!" cried Angelica.

"And upon my conscience, you—you squint little!" And he nearly choked himself th laughing. But at that moment the st lord-in-waiting entered and said: "Roy-Highnesses! You are expected in the Pink rone room, where they await the arrival Prince Bulbo." As Angelica's old govness (now Countess Gruffanuff) walked rough the court on her way to the Pink rone room, she spied something glittering the pavement. It turned out to be the ng Angelica had thrown away; it was too all for any of her old knuckles, so the untess put it in her pocket. She went on

In the throne room and took her place behind the king and queen; Angelica sat at their feet, and behind the king's chair stood Giglio, looking very savage. Prince Bulbo at last made his appearance, followed by a black page carrying the most beautiful crown you ever saw. "I have ridden 300 miles since breakfast," said he, "so eager was I to behold the Princess Angel-I mean the august family of Paflagonia, and I could not wait to change my traveling costume."

"Your Royal Highness is welcome in any dress," says the king. "A chair for his Royal Highness."

"Ah, but you should see my other clothes," says Prince Bulbo.

"Any dress his Royal Highness wears is a court dress," says Angelica, smiling gra-

Giglio burst out laughing with derision. "And who are you?" says Bulbo, very fierce-

"My father was the king of this country, and I am his only son," replies Giglio with equal haughtiness. "Ha!" said the king, looking flurried. But collecting himself he said: 'Dear Prince Bulbo, Giglio. Know each other!"

When the day was ended, little Rosalba came to put Countess Gruffanuff's hair in papers, and the countess said: "Rosalba, you dressed my hair very nicely to-day; I promised you a little present. Here are five shil-no, here is a pretty little ring that I picked-that I have had some time." she gave Rosalba the magic ring. It fitted exactly. "You may go, now, and warm the king's bed, and then you may unrip my green silk, and then do me a cap for the morning, and mend the hole in my silk stocking, and then you can go to bed, Rosalba. Mind, I shall want my cup of tea at five in the morning. Grau-haw-boo! Honghrho!" In fact she was snoring sound asleep. So pretty Rosalba went for the coals and filled the royal warming-pan. As soon as she had warmed the bed she went out into the hall where whom should she meet but Prince Giglio? And what do you think Giglio does? He goes down on his knees and offers to marry her that moment. "Oh, Rosalba," says the prince, "I have lived fifteen years in thy company without seeing thy perfections! What woman in all Europe, Africa and America-nay in Australia, only it is not yet discovered-can presume to be thy equal?"

"Oh, prince! I am but a poor lady's-maid," says Angelica, looking, however, very much pleased.

"Didst thou not tend me in my sickness, when all forsook me?" continues Giglio. "Didst not bring me jelly?"

"Yes, dear prince, I did," says Rosalba, "and I sewed your Royal Highness's shirtbuttons on, too, if you please, your Royal Highness," cries this artless maiden. But let us pass over the remainder of this touching scene. When Rosalba at last departed, she left the warming-pan on the floor. Giglio siezed it up, and kissing it because Rosalba had carried it, he rushed downstairs. What should he see on the landing but his majesty, the king, talking to Rosalba! Such was the effect of the magic ring!" "Charming maid," says the king, "turn thy eyes on a middle-aged autocrat, who has been considered not ill-looking in his time."

"Oh, sir! what will her majesty say?" cries Rosalba.

"Her majesty!" laughs the monarch—"her majesty be hanged! Have I not blocks, axes, ropes, hangmen? Runs not a river by my palace wall? Say but the word—thy mistress straightway in a sack is sewn, and thou the sharer of my throne!"

When Giglio heard these atrocious sentiments he forgot the respect due to royalty, lifted up the warming-pan and knocked down the king as flat as a pancake. After which Giglio took to his heels, Angelica ran off screaming, and the queen came out of her room. Fancy her feelings! As soon as the coals began to burn him the king came to himself, stood up and stamped his royal feet with rage. "Ho, captain of the guards!" "Headzoff! good his majesty exclaimed. Headzoff! seize upon the prince. Awaylet him die!" Lifting up the tails of his dressing-gown, the king entered his own apartment. Captain Headzoff was much affected, having a sincere love for Giglio. "Poor, poor Giglio! Is it my hand must lead him to death? The king commands me to hang the prince. The prince! Obedience is the soldier's honor. The prince! Butbut—he didn't say what prince. Well, then, I'll take Bulbo and hang him!" And he began to dance about for joy. "Prince Bulbo's head will do capitally," says he; and he went to arrest the prince the first thing next morning.

He knocked at the door. "Who's there?" "Captain Headzoff? Step in, pray, my good Captain. I'm delighted to see you. My lord chamberlain will act for me in any business you may have on hand."

"I beg your royal highness's pardon, but you will will have to act for yourself. This business is done with axes among us! By this warrant I am to take you prisoner and turn you over to-to the executioner."

"Pooh, pooh, my good man-ho! Stop, I say!" But the guards seized him, tied a handkerchief over his face and led him away. The king, who happened to be talking to Countess Gruffanuff, saw him passing, and not knowing it was Bulbo, took a pinch of snuff and said: "So much for Giglio. Now let's go to breakfast."

Captain Headzoff handed Prince Bulbo to the sheriff with this fatal order:

"At night cut off the bearer's head."

VALOROSO XXIV.

"It's a mistake," says Bulbo, who did not seem to understand the business in the least.

"Poo-poo-pooh!" says the sheriff. poor Bulbo was led to the scaffold where an executioner with a block and a tremendous ax was always ready in case he was wanted.

THE FORGIVING SPIRIT.*

We studied last week the beautiful teachings of our Lord regarding the children and our sacred obligations to them. Jesus passed next to a consideration of the duty of his followers to one another, and first, when one has been wronged by his brother. Three steps are to be taken for reclaiming the wrong-doer. First, he who has suffered the wrong is to go alone to his brother and seek to bring him to repentance. Failing in this he is to take with him one or two mutual friends and renew the attempt. If the transgressor is still impenitent the matter is to be laid before the church and an effort made through proper agency of the whole body to bring him to a sense of his sin. If he refuses to hear the church he is to be counted as a heathen man and a publican; that is, he forfeits the fellowship and is denied the companionship of the congregation until such time as he recognizes and acknowledges his sin. It is to be deplored that this simple and righteous method of discipline has well-nigh disappeared from our churches.

Jesus then extends to the body of the disciples the promise given shortly before to Peter, that the action of the assemby of believers, when guided by the spirit of love and unity, will be sanctioned in heaven, and promises to their united prayers a certain answer, and to their united gatherings in his name the assurance of his presence. Peter had been deeply impressed by what Jesus said about reclaiming an erring brother, and perhaps was meditating over his words while he talked of prayer, so that this part of his discourse was unheard by the apostle. Suddenly the subterranean stream of thought breaks forth in the question: "Lord, how oft shall my brother sin against me and I forgive him? until seven times?" The new wine was beginning to burst the old bottles of rabbinic forms. The rabbis taught that one should forgive an offender three times only, and then when the wrong-doer had himself sought forgiveness. The Master had declared that the innocent party must seek the guilty and try to reconcile him. Peter thought he had surely gone to the very limit of divine forbearance when he suggested seven times as the possible measure of the new law of pardoning grace. But Jesus rebukes the narrowness of the apostle's spi it by a single sentence: "I say not unto thee until seven times, but until seventy times seven." In other words, there is no limit to the spirit of forgiveness. You are to pardon your brother every time he repents. As Jesus had said on another occasion: "If thy brother sin, rebuke him, and if he repent, forgive him. And if he sin against thee seven times in the day, and seven times turn again to thee saying, I repent; thou shalt forgive him" (Luke 17:3,4). True charity does not count occasions; it courts them.

Then follows the parable of the servant who received mercy and then denied it to his fellow-servant. He owed to his king a debt of ten thousand talents, an enormous sum, which he could not have owed except by reason of extensive fraud or peculation and which he could never hope to repay. Discovered in his crime and brought face to face with his royal master, his guilt is soon established and the command given in accordance with the cruel laws of the time, that he and his family be sold and the proceeds applied upon the debt. Appealing for mercy, that he may have time to restore what he has taken he is answered with unmeasured grace, his master forgiving him the debt. Going forth from this experience of unmerited favor he meets a fellowservant who owes him a trifling debt of a hundred pence, and deaf to his appeal for mercy couched in the identical words he had himself used to his master he throws him into prison until the debt is paid. When this comes to the ears of the king he cancels his former remission of the debt of the wicked servant and delivers him to the cruel jailers to be tormented as his base conduct deserved.

It hardly needs the application made by Jesus in the closing verse of the lesson to teach us his purpose in this parable. He would have us know that the unforgiving spirit is unforgiven. Ingratitude and intolerance go together. He who will not forgive another cannot find forgiveness for himself. We are taught to pray: "Forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors." There is nothing more disappointing than revenge. "Reverge, indeed, seems often sweet to men; but oh, it is only sugared poison, only sweetened gall, and its after taste is bitter as hell." What comfort, what joy can ever come to a human heart from the consciousness that an injury has been revenged? And how sweet the peace of a heart that has healed the hurt of wanton injury with the balsam of entire forgiveness! Who would not covet to go into the presence of God with the words of the dying Jesus, uttered in behalf of his enemies upon his lips: "Father, forgive them; they know not what they do?" What unspeakable joy must have filled the soul of Stephen when, as his soul left the poor, bruised and broken body, he cried out in behalf of those who stoned him: "Lord, lay not this sin to their charge!"

The contrast between the generous pardon of the king and the cruel intolerence of the wicked servant is one to which we are not wholly strangers to-day. How many of those who call themselves Christians, who claim to be the objects of redeeming grace, who sing with unction—

When Jesus washed my sins away!"

cherish in their hearts bitter thoughts against those who have done them a real or a fancied wrong. How much more noble the Christian method of revenging injury: "If thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink; for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head." The best way to overcome an enemy is to make him a friend, and this can only be done by loving him. "Mercy is the rod by which the noble-minded chastise." I like the old English proverb, "Forgiveness and a sile are the best revenge."

This lesson is not an easy one to practice; that is, by the methods we are wont to follow. There is an easy way to practice forgiveness, to cultivate graciousness toward our erring brethren, and that is to live in daily and rich experience of the divine grace. In the exact measure of our enjoyment of God's grace from day to day, through humble penitence and contrite prayer, through fervent love and earnest service, will we be able to exercise this grace toward others. The fullness of the inflow will determine the volume of the outflow. "The miller, finding that some of the lumps are large and hard, and that the millstones are consequently almost standing still, goes quietly out and lets more water on. Go you and do likewise. When injuries that seem large and hard are accumulated on your head, and the process of forgiving them begins to choke and go slow under pressure, as if it would soon stop altogether; when the demand for forgiveness grows great and the forgiving power in the heart is unable to meet it; then enter into your closet and shut your door and pray to your Father specifically for more experience of his forgiving love; so shall your forgiving love grow stronger and overcome every obstacle that stands in its way. Your heart under the fresh impulse of pardon to you through the blood of the covenant will toss off with ease the load of impediments that obstructed for a time its movements and you will forgive even as you have been forgiven."

TOPIC FOR AUGUST 12.

ZEAL.

(Luke 16:1-13.)

"Had I served my God with half the zeal I erved my king he would not in mine age have eft me naked to mine enemies." So spake the vorldly Cardinal Wolsey, as he tottered to his ray-haired fall. And so, no doubt, have many thers wao have ventured like wanton boys for nany summers on a wide sea, supported only by he pomp of empty bladders of this earth's ends, poken the disappointment of age and defeat.

If we could but learn, we Christian workers, to hrow into our great cause one-half the enthuiastic zeal the children of this world pour into heir pursuits or we ourselves pour into this world's pursuits, we should find ourselves more ranquil now as well as in our age. We know now in the matters of this life to push and strive; so few of us in the matters of the kingdom have earned the same energy and zeal.

The Master commended the unrighteous steward, not for his unrighteousness, but for his display of energy when the day of difficulty was irawing near. If the children of light should display equal energy and wisdom for the welfare of the Master's work, how much greater would be the commendation from the Master. It is wonderful how much adroitness we can manifest when matters of business are to be adjusted, how ittle zeal and finesse we are able to summon when a church quarrel or a church problem or a church transaction is to be handled. The former we ought to have done, but the latter we ought to leave undone.

And yet after all our church people ought to be commended for the zeal they often do manifest. No fault of leaders in church work is often more flagrant than lack of appreciation. When we find zeal to commend, let us commend. It is truly admirable the effort that is often put forth by church building committees, ladies' circles, organ fund promoters, choirs, ushers and all manner of church workers. It is cheering to the hopes of the church of the future to see the devotion of some of the workers of the present. These who are faithful, whether it be over a few or over many things, shall hear a plaudit of well done. The young lady charg d with the decoration of a pulpit who does it with her might may one day be charged with the adorning of a mansion in that house of many mansions. The young man who serves faithfully as a doorkeeper in the house of the Lord here may one day stand beside and assist him who bears the keys of the kingdom of heaven

And so, in all the humblest duties of home or business life, he who is zealous over a few shall be made ruler of many. He who paints a small picture here with all his might hall one day "splash at a ten-league canvas with brushes of comet's hair." He who keeps strict accounts, faithfully, zealously, shall one day hear the call, come up higher and keep larger accounts. Nor is this promise of greater opportunity a holding out of selfish motives. It is rather the giving of greater tasks and an opening for greater zeal. It is offering as inducement "the joy of the working."

I lately discovered that the author of a wellknown poem, first published in the Century Magazine and since circulated all over the world. Dr. Ansen G. Chester, for many years a Presbyterian minister, is now a member of our church in Buffalo and an occasional contributor to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. May I not, as it so well fitted to this subject, publish the poem entire?

Book Notes.

In view of the present tremendous upheaval in China it is small wonder that we are having a decided demand for "Facts About China," by Wm. Remfry Hunt. Mr. Hunt is now and has for years been a resident of Chu Cheo, Central China. He is thoroughly familiar with China and the Chinese. His book is full of information about the government, manners, customs, religion, geography, climate, industries, etc., of the Chinese Empire. The price is but twenty-five cents.

"Alexander Campbell's Theology," by W. E. Garrison, the most recent book issued by the Christian Publishing Company, is alrea y receiving high commendation from many of our leading men and best thinkers. It is a handsome volume of 302 pages, worthy in every respect a place in the library of every preacher and thinking Disciple. Price, $1.00.

The sale of "Christian Science Dissected" still increases. Every copy of this little booklet that is sold seems to sell one or two more. It is not an abstruse treatise, but a plain, straightforward, bright and entertaining dissection of the ridiculous claims of Mary Baker Eddy and her followers and of the doctrine they preach. Preachers and physicians unite in pronouncing it the strongest, most forcible work against Christian Science that has yet appeared. The price is twenty-five

"The Christian Worker," a practical manual for preachers and church officials, by Jos. H. Foy, is a little volume which has been having a large sale of late. Libis is the best work of its kind ever issued. It contains hints, helps and suggestions for baptisms, funerals, marriages, ordinations, dedications, missionary meetings, special collections, thanksgiving services, etc., together with outlines and suggested texts for sermons for all special occasions, advice to pastors on the management and care of the congregation, and in short, a great amount of matter invaluable to every preacher. The book contains 189 pages, is bound in cloth and sells for seventyfive cents.

Let our readers remember that our offer of Alexander Campbell's works still stands. Offer reduction of the price of the works of the great reformer was, without doubt, THE book event of the history of our people. We offer the Complete Works for $8.40, or the volumes singly as advertised. During the past few weeks we have sold hundreds of volumes of these works, but we know that many have not yet taken advantage of the

The Atlantic Monthly for August contains several attractive and interesting articles, not the least of which? is "The Iowans," by Rollin Lynde Hartte.

The '[August number of Scribner's is always noted for its short stories. It is a fiction number. This year promises to be unusually rich in this as well as in other respects.

Everybody's Magazine for August, aside from its leading articles, contains a number of short stories, all complete and particularly well chosen.

The midsummer Woman's Home Companion presents a handsome and well-edited issue of a journal that is certainly well to the front among firstclass magazines.

St. Nicholas for August is one of the most popular numbers of this popular magazines, for the year. Its selections, variety and illustrations are decidedly interesting and pleasing.

The Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway has heretofore rossessed the distinction of being the only line with its own track and trains all the way from Chicago to Los Angeles and San Diego. San Francisco and the important cities of the San Joaquin Valley are now added to the vast territory served by this great transportation system under one management which territory also tem under one management, which territory also includes a large part of the region between Denver on the north, and Galveston on the south.

Stress is laid upon single ownership and management, which insure uniform excellence of service. Overland trains by this route do not miss connection, because they run through. FACTS ABOUT CHINA.

We recently published a booklet, entitled "Facts About China," by Wm. Remfrey Hunt, of Chu Cheo, China. Mr. Hunt has been for many years a resident of Central China, and is thoroughly acquainted with the country and its people. The following are some of his topics:

Vastness of Chinese Empire, History and Age of China, The People of China, Populousness of China, Climate and Products.

Classic and Sacred Systems, Strange Manners and Customs. Some Absurdities of Heathenism, Lauguage, Education and Literature, Missions in China.

"Facts About China" is concisely and tersely written. The purpose of the author is to convey information and to instruct and not to entertain or amuse. Nevertheless, the book is thoroughly interesting. A map of the Chinese Empire is included in the book.

The Acme.... Smelting and Refining Company

Offers to Investors for a Short Time Unequaled Advantages.

IT IS A WELL-KNOWN FACT

That a custom smelter, properly equipped and operated, is the most certain source of revenue in the mining business

Is not contingent upon the output of any one mine or group of mines, but draws its support from a large number of mines in the district where it is located. There are 100 producing and paying mines within a convenient distance of our smelter site and at least 200 more would be developed if there was a custom smelter conveniently located to which ore could be shipped for treatment.

A CUSTOM SMELTER

Bears the same relation to mining that a grist mill does to an agricultural district, with the profits greatly in favor of a custom smelter. The usual net profits of a custom smelter are about $3.00 per ton.

WE HAVE GIVEN YEARS

Of careful study to our plans and know that we are warranted in our undertaking-the erection of a custom smelting plant. Risks which exist in all ordinary mining operations have been carefully eliminated from our plans. We have water, fluxes, an inexhaustible supply of ore and a clear field.

WE CONTRACT NO DEBTS. OUR MOTTO IS: CASH or NOTHING.

A CUSTOM SMELTER HAS THESE ADVANTAGES OVER ALL KINDS OF COMMERCIAL BUSINESS:

The product of a smelter invariably sells for cash.

The ore smelted is ample security for the expense of smelting. Profits are always large, often reaching 50 per cent. annually on the par value of the stock. 3.

Charges for smelting are always collected before the "matte" or refined ore is delivered from the smelter.

5. A custom smelter has no bad debts.

6. A gold smelter's out-put never fluctuates in value.

7. A gold smelter is absolutely independent of any financial stringency, business stagnation, political disturbance, or other calamity which jeopardizes all ordinary classes of investments.

The Board of Directors are all men of high moral and business standing.

For a short time we are offering a limited amount of stock at 50 cents a share—one-half payable in cash, and balance in five equal monthly installments, or where the entire amount is paid in one payment 45 cents a share. Stock is issued full paid and non-assessable. Most respectfully,

Church Extension.

OUR SEPTEMBER OFFERING AND THE APPORTION-MENT: THE $20,000 IN SEPTEMBER—SHALL WE GET IT?

Twenty thousand dollars is the amount yet needed to complete the $250,000 for Church Extension. The earnest recommendation of the the Jubilee Convention was that we raise $50,000 this year in order to complete the first quarter of a million for Church Extension by September 30, 1900. A little over $30,000 has been raised since Oct. 1st, 1899, which began this missionary year. The board has done its utmost up to Aug. 1st to get a good start for the $50,000 to be raised this year. Three-fifths of the needed amount is already in the treasury and the other two-fifths will surely be raised by the chu-ches in the approaching September offering.

THE IMPORTANCE OF THIS OFFERING

Must be apparent to all who want to see the $250,000 mark reached. The board now h s no other source from which to make any increase. Success must come in September or we fail. The preachers and elders and the churches generally have seen to it that the other boards reached the mark set and will work heartily to make the effort of the Board of Church Extension a success. We shall reach the goal by the aid of the preachers and churches.

OUR FORMER EFFORTS.

From all sources last year the September offering yielded over $13,000. To succeed we must raise nearly $7,000 more than last September. Last year's offerings in September were an increase of $4,000 over 1898. September, 1900, will bring an increase of $7,000 over 1899. Then the victory is sure.

THE APPORTIONMENT.

The board has suggested a just and careful apportionment, based on what the churches have done for the other missionary enterprises. No church has been asked for more than $300 and none for less than $5. Why should there not be inaugurated at once an earnest and sympathetic movement among pastors, official boards and their people to reach the apportionment suggested by the board? The amount asked of your congregation is not arbritrary, but is simply to show you that we can reach the desired $250,000 provided your congregation does the part indicated by your apportionment. The board has every confidence that the desires of the brotherhood will be realized in September.

ORDER YOUR SUPPLIES.

The board will send the following snpplies free: "Nugget of Truth on Church Extension," with our new map in colors on the reverse side. These should be ordered in quantities sufficient to supply every member of your church. They will institute a campaign of education. If political campaigns are educative it is equally important that we educate on this vital work. The board also furnishes small "Collection Envelopes." These are prepared so as to pictorially represent Church Extension. Our "Pastoral Letters" are useful. Send a postal to the secretary, state what you need and they will be mailed free.

There is, of course, a censorship ver the news, and we may be assured that lans which have been adopted are not hade public. The attempt of Li Hung hang to prevent the movement on Pekin y the allied forces by the promise to eliver the ministers and other foreigners t Tien-Tsin has failed. Secretary Hay, hrough whom this proposition was made, nformed the aged Viceroy that this governnent will not enter into any arrangement egarding the disposition or treatment of he legations without first having free communication with Minister Conger. ponsibility for the protection of the legations, he was informed, rests upon the Chinese government, and that the power to deliver the ministers at Tien-Tsin presupposes the power to protect them and to open communication between them and their respective governments. Secretary Hay's reply to Earl Li, through Consul General Goodnow at Shanghai, is a very important and solemn warning to China. When he says: "Since the Chinese government admits that it possesses the power to give communication, it puts itself in an unfriendly attitude by denying it," he reaches what is considered as the extreme of diplomacy, bordering very closely on a declaration of hostilities. He urges Earl Li "earnestly to advise the imperial authorities of China to place themselves in friendly communication and co-operation with the relief expedition. They are assuming a heavy responsibility in acting otherwise." There is no mistaking the meaning of this communication, and if China refuses to accept the warning, the consequences will be upon her own head.

One of the developments during the past week which has done much to solidify the allied forces and to depeen the conviction that war with China is inevitable was the information received from Dr. Morrison, of Pekin, correspondent of the London Times. to the effect that the Chinese government had issued an imperial edict calling on the Boxers "to continue to render loyal and patriotic servcie in exterminating the Christians." Dr. Morrison's reputation for thorough reliability gives extraordinary importance to his communication, which makes it certain that the Chinese government has been in league with the Boxers in their attack on the foreigners, and that it has been practicing deceit and fraud in order to deceive the other nations. the victory of Tien-Tsin, according to Dr. Morrison, that led the Chinese government to make truce with the foreigners. Now the plan evidently is to hold the ministers and other foreigners in Pekin as hostages, in order to prevent the advance on Pekin. Minister Wu thinks Dr. Morrison must be biased or misinformed, and is loth to believe that his government has actually been in league with the Boxers in their crusade against the foreigners. It must be confessed, however, that the evidence points very strongly in this direction, and any failure now on the part of the Chinese government to co-operate with the allied forces to put down the Boxers would be all the additional proof necessary to show its complicity in this high-handed crime against civilization. We are still of the opinion expressed early in the beginning of this insurrection, that we are confronted with nothing less than the problem of China's future, and that the time has come when the old order in the "Flowery Kingdom" must give way to the new. What this new order will be will depend upon the action of China herself, and upon the wisdom of the powers co-operating for its political regeneration.

A battle of seven hours' duration was fought on last Sunday between the allied troops and the Chinese troops twelve miles from Tien-Tsin on the road toward Pekin at a place called Peitsang, in which the Chinese were defeated, but not until after they had inflicted a loss of 1,200 killed and wounded on the allied troops. Further particulars of this battle are not yet given. It is thought that the allied troops numbered about 16,000 men. The Russian and Japanese are also said to have suffered most severely in the engagement. The strength of the Chinese troops is not given, neither their loss in the battle. There is every reason now for believing that the advance of the allied troops upon Pekin will be strongly contested. Chinese troops are said to be massing between Tien-Tsin and Pekin.

Conditions in Pekin are becoming more threatening and dangerous. Li Ping Hang, a rabid anti-foreign fanatic, has joined Prince Tuan, and the city of Pekin is now at their mercy. It is reported that two of the Tsung Li Yamen have been beheaded because of their expressed friendliness toward foreigners, and the lives of the ministers are again in jeopardy. What purports to be a late message from our minister, Conger, says: "Help at once, if at all. Beseiged in British Legation. No government in Pekin except military chiefs who are determined on destruction of foreigners." This message shows a fearful state of affairs in the imperial city. There are still rumors of an effort, to deliver the ministers at Tien-Tsin safely, but in the hope of stopping the advance upon Pekin. There is no indication on the part of the powers, however, to change their conduct.

Since the beheading of two of the commissioners of the Chinese Foreign Office because of their efforts in behalf of the foreigners in Pekin, Li Hung Chang has become alarmed and refuses to proceed toward Pekin. It is said that he has asked Pekin for a sick leave and that he has his baggage packed for flight. Sheng, the director of railroads and telegraphs at Shanghai, also fears decapitation and has appealed to the British Consul for protection. Li Hung Chang says that the foreign ministers left Pekin August third and predicts their death unless the advance upon Pekin by the allied forces is arrested. No declaration of war against China has yet been made by any of the powers, but it is expected that Russia and Germany may declare war at any moment. As the advance upon Pekin is now in progress events will develop more rapidly and the world will soon know of China's real attitude and designs.

It is said that all of the railroad companies have equipped their cars with self-coupling devices and air brakes. The law requiring this equipment was passed in 1896, but two extensions of the time were granted at the request of the railroads, the last one ending August 1, 1900.

The law provides that the United S'ates Attorney in the district with jurisdiction, upon information furnished, shall file suits against violating companies. It also requires that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall ascertain facts by inquiry regarding offending corporations and furnish the information to the district attorneys. Regarding the air brake the statute does not specify how many cars shall be so equipped. It merely reads:

"A sufficient number of cars in every train, freight and passenger, shall be equipped with automatic air brakes to control the movements of the train."

The number of cars required to so control a train has been fixed, after investigation, at 25 per cent. of the total number in any train. The Interstate Commerce Commission has approved this per cent.

It is now absolutely unnecessary to go between cars to couple or uncouple them. The work is done automatically or by a lever at the side of the car. The task of changing the cars to meet the requirements of the new law has been one of herculean proportions and the cost heavy. Of the twenty interstate roads entering Chicago the cost of the changes amounted to $48,478,420. All the Chicago roads have given notice that they will not accept cars for transit on their lines not equipped according to law. All of the St. Louis lines are said to have complied with the provisions of this law, and this is probably true of all the interstate railroads throughout the country. The penalty for each and every violation of this law is $100.

John Clark Ridpath, the historian, died in the Presbyterian Hospital, Now York City, on the evening of July 31st. As Dr. Ridpath occupied a prominent position in the literary world the following sketch of his life will be of interest to our readers. This sketch is from the St. Louis Republic:

John Clark Ridpath, LL.D., was born in Putnam County, Indiana, in April, 1841. He was graduated from Arbury (now Depauw) University in 1863, taking first honors. After serving as principal of an academy at Thorntown, Ind., and as Superintendent of Public Schools at Lawrenceburg, he was called, in 1869, to the chair of English literature at Depauw. He was transferred later to the chair of history and political philosophy.

phy. In 1873 he published his book, "An Academic History of the United States."

In 1876 he published his "Popular History of the United States," and afterwards "The Life and Work of Garfield." His "Cyclopædia of Universas History" was published in 1885.

In 1885 he resigned his professorship in Depauw and the vice-presidency of the university in order that he might devote his whole time to writing. In 1893 he published his "Life and Work of James G. Blaine," and in 1894 his "Great Races of Mankind." He was engaged for ten years in preparing the material and four years in writing this work. In 1898 he published his "Life and Times of Gladstone" and supplement to the "History of All Nations." He was for a time editor of the Arena Magazine of Boston. In 1896 he ran for Congresl on the Democratic ticket in his home district in Indiana and was defeated by a small majority.

In recent years he has been engaged in the preparation of a complete and elaborate history of the United States.

SOME LEADING IDEAS OF BROTHER PROCTER.

In the funeral address, published elsewhere in this number, we have given some of the characteristics of Bro. Procter as a religious thinker and indicated something of the nature of his mental processes. In this article we desire to mention a few of the leading or dominating ideas which may be said to be the result of his thinking. It is much to be regretted that Bro. Procter has left so little behind him in the form of literature, which will serve to indicate to coming generations what were his views upon the great questions of his day. He was not a writer. He disliked the mechanical labor of writing, and his mind seemed to work far more freely when speaking than when attempting to write down his thoughts. Even the little that he has written and published is not at our command, and we here record only such impressions as we have received from conversations with him, and from discourses which we have heard him preach, as to his leading ideas.

When we first became acquainted with Bro. Procter, more than a quarter of a century ago, he was making an earnest protest, both in "The Christian," of which he was at that time one of the editors, and in his public discourses, against what he deemed a legalistic interpretation of the gospel, which was manifesting itself among many of our writers and preachers. According to his way of thinking there was a most marked difference between the spirit of the law and the gospel, and he believed that this distinction was one of the chief characteristics of the Reformation which we are pleading, and that those who were drifting into legalism were not only untrue to the spirit of the gospel, but to the spirit of our own religious movement. He discarded such phrases as "the law of pardon," because they smacked too much of that legalism which he believed to be fatal to any proper understanding of the gospel. He never treated lightly the ordinances of the gospel: baptism and the Lord's Supper. Indeed, we have never heard any one clothe these institutions with more solemn and sublime significance than he. To him they were not laws of arbitrary appointment, on which hinged salvation, but symbols of great and fundamental truths and facts. He taught without equivocation the doctrine of justification by faith, but believed that the faiting which justifies expresses itself in overt acts of obedience, such as confession, baptism and the Lord's Supper. His presentation of the doctrine of baptism was of such a character as to disarm prejudice, remove misunderstanding and impart to those who heard him a new and higher conception of the meaning of that institution.

It early became characteristic of Bro Procter's thinking to conceive of God as being present in the world to-day as much as at any time in the past. He did not claim that His presence here was indicated always by the same signs, but that the tokens of the divine immanence were no less manifest in our day than in any previous age of the world. He believed that God had been always disclosing himself to human understanding as men could receive it, and that, too, in the material universe and in human history as well as in the Bible. But the perfect revelation of God's character and will he held was made in Jesus Christ, on whose glory, majesty, wisdom and perfection of character he loved to dwell. It is easy to see how this view of God's continual presence in the world rather than an occasional interference in human affairs, would lead him to adopt a theory of revelation and of inspiration not in harmony with the view held by those who have an entirely different conception of God's relation to the world. He believed that God spoke in men and through man's consciousness of God and His truth. He once illustrated his idea of inspiration by saying that it was not like a father repeating to his little child, who could not see out of the house, what he (the father) saw, and requiring the child to repeat what it had heard, but it was as if the father lifted the child up to the window and let it look out upon the world with its own eyes, and tell what it saw. So he believed God, by His Spirit, lifted men up to spiritual altitudes where they could see the realities of the spiritual universe. These men would not, of course, fully comprehend all they saw, but they would see and report enough for the spiritual guidance of their brethren who had not been lifted so high. Christ, however, had a full and perfect vision of God and of truth, and his teaching is the highest standard of right known to men.

There is abundant evidence that his religious thought was profoundly affected by the evolutionary theory which has come into such wide acceptance. His mind was one that would gladly welcome a great generalization like that, which seems to encompass all things in its majestic sweep. He never paused to question whether all the gaps in the theory had been filled up or whether the theory as interpreted by this and that scientist or philosopher was accurate, but the general conception of development commended itself to his mind, and elicited his profound admiration. It is needless, perhaps, to add that evolution with him was always theistic. It was not a substitute for God, but was God's method to bring about the vast changes which have taken place in the material universe. Evolution with him was not a creator, but the creative process which is still going on. "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work." Any materialistic view of evolution that dispensed with the personal Creator was to him superficial and unworthy of a moment's serious thought.

He applied this principle of development to men. He had a sermon on "Predestination" in which he first treated of predestination in nature, by which God had in the beginning predestined man, as the highest type of earthly being, and all the lower forms of life were looking forward to him. Adam was the culmination of the creative process in the material world. But Adam was only God's baby. Christ was God's man. As predestination in nature reached up to and found its culmination in man, so predestination in the spiritual kingdom reaches up to and finds its culmination in Christ. Hence it is the predestined purpose of God to conform believers to the image of Christ.

While he laid great emphasis upon Jesus as a teacher, he did not neglect the meaning and significence of his death, but that death, according to his view, had two great purposes: It was, in the first place, Christ's last, culminating testimony to the truth. He had a great sermon on the text, "For this purpose came I into the world, to bear witness to the truth." He bore this witness, in his death, to the truth of all that he had taught. But the second purpose accomplished was a new and startling revelation of divine love. It was in perfect harmony with all that Christ taught of his Father, and of Himself as God manifest in the flesh, that He would willingly lay down his life for the sins of the world. Not to appease an angry God, not to pay a purchase price to the devil, but to show to men the infinite heart of love which beat in the Father's bosom, Christ voluntarily submitted to death. But his death becomes efficacious only to those who are drawn by it to depart from their sins to love and serve God.

It is only true to say that he cherished what is sometimes called "the larger hope." He believed in the salvability of men, even the worst of men, and hoped that somehow. sometime, somewhere, God's love would conquer all opposition and compass the salvation of all men. He never deemed it possible for any man to be saved in sin, or without repentance. With him character was salvation, and while not dogmatically affirming that all men would avail themselves of the opportunity of turning to God in repentance, he hoped that such might be the case, and believed that whenever a penitent soul turned to God it would always find a forgiving Father. This was held more as a personal view, which he expressed in private conversation, than as a doctrine which he affirmed with the certainty of faith.

His view of the spiritual world and of the life hereafter was a marked characteristic of his teaching. He had no doubt as to the future life. He based his conviction on no mere proof-text, but on the rock bed of God's character. We asked him once what was the most convincing truth in his mind of the life hereafter. His reply was immediate and emphatic: "It is the love of God." Love, he said, always fights death. The mother never yields her child to death as long as she can fight the grim monster. But God is infinite in love and in power. He is stronger than death. He will not allow the soul that loves Him and that he loves to perish. On that truth He rested his faith, and fell asleep like a child on its mother's bosom, having no shadow of doubt that he would wake in the life beyond, because "God is love."

These were some, at least, of his leading thoughts. It is no part of our purpose to say how far they harmonize with our own views or with those of others. That gave him little concern. He could love others who differed from him, and he expected the same from them. A great preacher, a bold thinker, a Christly man, whose daily life was a manifestation of the Master's spirit has gone from us, but he leaves behind him an influence that shall linger long, even as the radiance of the sun lingers at eventime along the western sky long after it has sunk beneath the horizon. But as the sun, during his circuit, has imparted vitality and put into operation forces that will never cease, so this life has set in motion influences which will continue to affect the life and thought of men as long as time shall last.

HATRED OF EVIL.

(Prov. 6:16-19; 8:13; Heb. 1:8, 9.)

[Uniform Midweek Prayer-meeting Topic, August 15.]

CENTRAL TRUTH: One who loves righteousness must also hate iniquity, and as love is impotent except as it expresses itself in behalf of the object loved, so also is hatred if it opposes not that which it hates.

The Scriptures present two sides to the Christian character; the negative and the positive. One must not only "cease to do evil," but he must "learn to do well." He must also "abhor that which is evil," as well as "cleave to that which is good." The hatred of evil is an essential part of an effective love of righteousness. We do not really and truly love that which is good unless we also hate that which is evil. Any love of truth and righteousness that would seek to observe strict neutrality between good and evil would be condemned by every right-thinking person as lacking in reality and sincerity.

According to the Proverbs, Jehovah not only loves, but he also hates. Six things are specified here which the Lord hateth: "Yea, seven which are an abomination unto him." The things specified as those which the Lord hates are "haughty eyes," "a lying tongue," "hands that shed innocent blood," "a heart that deviseth wicked imaginations," "feet that be swift in running to mischief," "a false witness" and "he that soweth discord among brethren." It will be seen at once that these are all things which no good man can love, but which he, like the Lord, is bound to hate and to oppose. In another quotation we are told that "the fear of the Lord is to hate evil," and wisdom personified is said to hate "pride and arrogancy in the evil way, and the froward mouth."

It is not enough, according to these Scriptures, to love that which is true and beautiful and good, but the heart must be directed against the things which are of a contrary nature. Nor is this a peculiarity of the Old Testament teaching that is reversed in the New. On the contrary, we are told in the Hebrew letter, as cited above, that this quality of hating evil was a characteristic of the Christ of the New Testament:

"Thou hast loved righteousness and hated iniquity; Therefore God, thy God, hath annointed thee With the oil of gladness above thy fellows."

This, the author of the Hebrew letter says, was said of the Son. We know, too, from the record of Chri t's life that he not only "loved righteousness," but that he also "hated iniquity."

The importance of emphasizing this side of Christian character is obvious. It is easier to seek to make terms with the conditions of life as we find them than to seek to remedy them. Professed Christians often deceive themselves, thinking it is not necessary for them to assume a bold, open and above-board attitude of opposition toward that which is evil if only they personally abstain from participation in it. They are liable to reason in this way: "Why should I expose myself to the criticism of those who are engaged in evil pursuits or practices by openly opposing them? I cannot prevent these evils. Why not simply let them alone and go about my business?" The falacy of this sort of reasoning is apparent. If all Christians should assume that attitude toward the wrong-doing that is in the world, what progress would righteousness make, and how soon would the evils that exist be overcome? The prophets did not reason so. They denounced the evils of their times, though it often cost them their lives. The apostles of Christ did not do so. They not only testified in favor of Christ, but they condemned the evils of the age in which they lived. Most of them suffered martyrdom for so doing, but they counted this a small matter if they might only be found faithful. Christ assumed no neutral attitude, but put himself in uncompromising hostility to all the shams and false worship and iniquity of the world which he came to save.

It is clear, then, that those of us who would be followers of Christ must not only "cease to do evil," but must hate the evil with such an intensity as to lead us to do what in us lies to extirpate it. We must not assume a compromising attitude toward any practice or custom or business or institution that is contrary to the will of God, and that obstructs his kingdom. This course will often involve sacrifice of time, of ease, of popularity, of money, and sometimes even of life itself. Nevertheless, it is the only course which a Christian can pursue who would be a true follower of Jesus Christ. A Christian life is a warfare and the victory can only be achieved by a courageous assault upon the evil that is within us as well as upon that without, and only then as we fight in the strength which the Lord supplies.

PRAYER.

O, righteous Father, who hast called us through the gospel of Thy Son to a life of righteousness, inspire us, we beseech Thee, not only with a love for that which is good, but also with a hatred for that which is evil, and give us courage, we pray Thee, to antagonize the evil while we seek to cultivate the good. Forbid that we should seek to be neutral in the great conflict in which the forces of righteousness and of evil are arrayed against each other, but may we take our position on the side of right, and do valient service against iniquity until Thou shalt crown us with everlasting victory, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen!

Editor's Easy Chair or MACATAWA MUSINGS.

No one feature of Macatawa Park impresses the visitor more than the unique character of its religious services. Those of last Lord's day were typical. In the great auditorium in the woods near the crest of the hill that overlooks Macatawa Bay clear up to Holland an audience gathered that filled nearly every seat. A chorus choir rendered inspiring music, in which the audience joined. The sermon by Bro. Tyrrell, of Chicago, was on the characteristic differences between the children of God and the children of the devil in relation to sin. It was one of Bro. Tyrrell's best efforts and profoundly moved his audience. gathering in the evening on the beach was even larger. It is estimated that fifteen hundred people gathered on the sand at the margin of the lake where the waves were gently lapping the shore to participate in these evening services. The sccidental drowning of a boy in the afternoon near the pier had cast its shadow over the people in the Park and a feeling of deepened solemnity pervaded the evening meeting. Bro. Richardson, of Kansas City, who conducted the beach service, called attention to the incident and special prayer was offered for the bereaved family. In the brief addresses which followed by Bros. Muckley, W. T. Moore and T. P. Haley, the problem of human suffering and losses of this kind were dealt with, midst the profound attention of the great gathering. The crescent moon setting over the lake, and the silent stars overhead, added to the beauty and solemnity of the scene. It was evident that a deep religious impression was made on many who were present.

The following statements from the Benton Harbor Evening News indicate what impression the Casual visitor receives from spending a Sunday at Macatawa Park:

One week ago Sunday I visited St. Joseph. Yesterday I spent at Macatawa. Both are summer resorts on the east shore of Lake Michigan. They are 50 miles apart in distance and 50,000 miles apart in their ideals of Sunday observance.

The difference in the way Sunday was spent at the two points surprised me. At St. Joseph it seemed as though I were attending a Fourth-of-July celebration.

After describing the disorder that prevailed at the other place, the correspondent says:

The visitor receives a different impression as soon as he reaches Macatawa Park on a Sunday. No liquor is sold on the grounds. The services of policemen are not needed. The people who populate the resort are for the most part familieshusbands and wives with their children. They gather there, not for a carnival of fun, not to single out brides and grooms who have just been ground out of the matrimonial mill, but they are there for rest and the visitor for even a day can not help but notice the fact. Last evening there was a scene enacted that would startle St. Joseph-a scene enacted every Sunday evening. On the sandy beach, just as the sun had bathed its hot face in the waters of the lake, the resorters gathered. Some came with camp chairs, others seated themselves on the sand. In the center of the group of several hundred was an old melodeon, in other days the pride of some home. About the instrument was reserved a place for the children where scores gathered in reverent attention.

We have spoken of the type of religious life being developed here at the Park as somewhat unique. The elements of this uniqueness, as near as we can analyze it, are, first, a catholicity of feeling and of spirit which is broader than any denomination. We have but one church here, and that is made up of Christians of various names and creeds, and denominational lines are wholly ignored. There are no outcroppings of denominational jealousies, no seeking of advantage, no glorying in sect, and on the other hand no attempt at concealing one's religious affiliation. There is a practical recognition of a Christian brotherhood that embraces all who love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity. In the next place, along with this catholicity of spirit there is an unmistakable evangelical type of religious thought and feeling. Speakers and worshipers here accept the great fundamental truths held in common by evangelical churches, and these are the truths which receive emphasis in the preaching and in the talks on the beach. A few years since we had a discourse by a so-called liberal preacher, who made an assault upon what is regarded as vital and fundamental by most Christians, and while his statements were quietly repudiated by the audience there was no discourtesy shown to the speaker. A third element of the unique character of the religious life of this place is its freedom from conventionalities. It is free, informal, natural. While there is an earnest religious feeling there is no pietistic cant; no goody goody type of religion which manifests itself in gush and emotionalism. It is a practical sort of religion that believes in being kind and helpful, goodnatured, reverent, decent and unselfish. It is needless to say that this type of religious life has been given to the place by the people who gather here, and may be said to be a sort of composite religious life, made up of the different elements represented here. It is confidently believed that there is going out from this summer resort a healthy and invigorating religious influence which can not but prove helpful to the churches whose membership is represented in these gatherings.

We are now in the closing month of our stay at the Park this season. August is one of our fullest months at this place. The population is now at its height. The past week has given us delightful weather. Of evenings bonfires have gleamed along the lakeshore, while around them in a circle are grouped the radiant faces of congenial friends having a social hour of enjoyment together, one feature of which is usually the marshmallow roast. Sometimes there is a casual meeting of a half-dozen or more old friends on the beach and they sit down on the sand and hold an informal conversa tion. On vesterday afternoon a large number of friends and acquaintances here, embracing a number of names familiar to our readers, went on a little excursion on the "Lizzie Walsh," which makes daily trips to Saugatuck, leaving Macatawa at two and returning at six o'clock. Saugatuck is about three miles from the mouth of the Kalamazoo River where it empties into the lake, about nine miles south of this place. It was a delightful ride down the lakeshore and up the winding Kalamazoo to the quaint old town of Saugatuck. There the party disembarked, rested under the shade of the trees, indulged themselves in several baskets of ripe peaches, and after an hour's rest entered upon the return trip. Many of the old songs were sung on the way and the social feature was very enjoyable as well as the ride. On returning to the Park a number of us who had taken our evening meal along carried it to the summit of Bald Knob, one of the tallest sandhills here, where Macatawa Bay with its cottage-lined shores reaching up to Holland, in the distance, lay to the east of us in full view, while to the west was Lake Michigan, calm and unruffled and crimson with the rays of the setting sun Seldom does one ever enjoy a repast surrounded by scenes more beautiful and awe-inspiring. To-morrow the Macatawa Assembly begins and in our next we shall have something to say concerning it.

Edgewood-on-the-Lake, Aug. 4.

Questions and Hnswers.

1. At the age of about sixteen a young man confessed Christ and was baptized. For several years he tried to live a consistent Christian life, but in an evil hour he was led away into bad associates and committed acts which he knew at the time were sinful. Later on he saw the enormity of his sin, and resolving to reform his ways began to study for the ministry, and has for several years been preaching and his work is seemingly blessed of God. In the light of Heb. 6:4, 6, what in your judgment is his assurance of final salvation?

2. A young man was once a member of the Baptist Church and was "turned out" for some real or imagined inconsistency. Two years ago he killed man, and upon his conviction was sentenced to die. During his imprisonment the officers say he has been a most exemplary prisoner, reading his Bible and constant in prayer and strong in his assurance of divine pardon and acceptance with God. He bases his faith for salvation upon such Scriptures as Jno. 6:37; Heb. 7:25; Matt. 12:31. Query: How can these Scriptures be harmonized with 1 Jno. 3:15 and Rev. 21:8?

- 1. The only assurance that such an one can have of either his present or final salvation is in the genuineness or reality of his repentance. The passage in Hebrews, referred to cannot mean every sin committed, but such a deliberate rejection of Christ as leaves no opportunity for repentance. It is a very grave matter to sin against light, and there is danger that persons may continue in evil-doing until "it is impossible to renew them again unto repentance." It is of the first importance that those who have been enlightened and have tasted of the heavenly gift and then have fallen away in sin, to see to it that their repentance is thorough. Be sure to distinguish between remorse or regret for the results of sin, and the turning of the mind and heart away from sin, because it is sin. We must hate sin for its own sake.
- 2. Murder is a sin that may be repented of as other sins, and when one who has committed murder repents and thus has changed in his moral nature so that he hates the crime he is no longer a murderer, and thus his salvation is harmonized with the passages of Scripture referred to, which tell us that "no murderer hath eternal life."
- 1. Are we commanded to pray for sinners?
- 2. Do we inherit our sins from our parents?
 - 3. What does the word "talent' mean?

 E. C. Summers.
- 1. We are commanded to pray for "all men." Sinners are especially in need of our prayers. We should pray that they may be led to repentance.
- 2. No; sin is not a thing that can be inherited. It is a personal act. We may inherit certain tendencies from our parents which may lead to sin. Heredity has much to do in determining character, but each one is responsible for his own sins.
- 3. Among the Hebrews talent meant a weight and a denomination of money. A talent of silver was equivalent to three thousand shakels, and in weight was equal to about ninety-three and three-fourths pounds avoirdupoise. In our money it has been estimated to be worth from $1,645.00 to $1,916.00. In its figurative sense it stands for intellectual ability, natural or acquired. This figurative sense originated probably from the use of the word in the Farable of the Talents.

Here are some statements from Bishop Merrill's book which I would be glad to have you answer. T. S. Holland.

- 1. Is baptize a generic term?
- 2. The baptism of John, the record is brief and begins so abruptly as to imply that the Jews were familiar with the rite, and that, as the Jews understood it, it was by sprink-ling

- 3. On the day of Pentecost we have a baptism by pouring as certain as there is meaning in words (see Acts 2:17, 18).
- 4. The beginning of infant baptism cannot be found this side the days of the apostles, for the space of 1100 A D. there was not a society of Christians on earth that called in question infant baptism.
- 1. No; it is a specific term, having a specific meaning. Otherwise we should not know what to do in obedience to the command to be baptized.
- 2. It is assumed here that the Jews were acquainted with sprinkling water upon persons as a religious rite. This is not the case. The Jews were probably acquainted with immersion and were not surprised at John's practice.
- 3. This is to confuse cause and effect. The outpuring of the Spirit on Pentecost was not the baptism, but the baptism in the Spirit was the result of the outpouring. "And they were all filled with the Holy Spirit and began to speak with other tongues as the Spirit gave them utterance." This being "filled with the Holy Spirit" was the baptism in the Spirit. Their spirits were overwhelmed by and under the control of the Holy Spirit. This in figurative language is called baptism in the Holy Spirit.
- 4. It is sufficient answer to the above to say that the New Testamet is silent concerning the practice of infant baptism. This is admitted by the highest Pedobaptist scholarships. There is no question in our mind but that it was introduced after the days of the apostles. The fact that it was not objected to during a long period of the church when it was in apostasy proves nothing for the validity of an ordinance that has no significance in the New Testament.
- 1. What is the history of "the right hand of fellowship?"
 - 2. Is it scriptural?
- 3. Do the Churches of Christ generaly observe it?
 - 4. Is the practice beneficial or harmful? S. A. Nesbit.
- 1. The first instance recorded, of giving the right hand of fellowship, is the incident where Saul was introduced to the apotles at Jerusalem after his conversion by Barnabas, when they gave him and Barnabas the right hand of fellowship (Gal. 2:9). We are not prepared to say to what extent this custom has prevailed in the church since, though we believe it is quite general, if not universal, among Protestants.
- 2. It is not scriptural in the sense that we have an instance of it recorded in the New Testament, and it is scriptural in the sense that it is in perfect harmony with the New Testament teaching and spirit, when not abused. It should never be required as one of the conditions of church membership, but as a formal method of recognizing persons as within the fellowship of the church.
 - 3. We think they generally do.

4. We regard it as beneficial rather than harmful. It seems to be perfectly natural and proper, and gives the church an opportunity of expressing a welcome, either personally, as in some instances, or through the paster or presiding officer, which is the most general custom.

The following is in response to a recent inquiry in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:

Referring to question on page 903 of the Christian Evangelist of July 19: "Where did H. W. Beecher make a statement credited to him," etc., I send this quotation from a little volume I have, entitled "Life Thoughts Gathered from the Extemporaneous Discourses of Henry Ward Beecher, by Edna Dean Proctor:"

*"Christian brethren, in heaven you are known by the name of Christ; on earth, for convenience sake, you are known by the name of Presbyterians, Episcopalians, Methodists, Congregationalists and the like. Let me speak the language of heaven and call you simply Christians. Whoever of you has known the name of Christ and feels Christ's life beating within him is invited to remain and sit with us at the table of the Lord."

The star refers to a footnote as follows: "Invitation to the common service."

Current Religious Thought.

From an article of unusual merit in a recent issue of the Cumberland Presbyterian on "Church Declension and Faith Expansion," by T. M. Hartman, D. D., we reprint the following timely paragraph:

Never before in the history of the world was the keen vision of the prophet in greater demand than to day. We need more men with that spiritual intuition that discerns the glory of twentieth-century possibilities for the cause of Christ—men with the reach and the grasp to bring great forces into harmony with high and holy missions. And why should not the church produce such men? Why should not the Christian prophet be as far-sighted and versatile-minded as the prophets of mammon? Why should the financial prophet have a deeper penetration into the processes of modern fortune-making than the religious prophet has in adapting means and adjusting forces to the promotion of God's kingdom on the earth? The effeminacy and cowardliness of modern Christianity is due to the fact that the church has not kept pace with her advantages. Instead of recognizing the fact that religion is the life of the earth, the very soul of all temporal enterprise, the molding energy of every material resource, the inspiration and guide of all progress, we have been preaching and teaching a kind of etherealized religion, the chief impetus of which is to "keep hands off." The church has stood aloof from the greater things; she has so indoctrinated the youth into thriftlessness and doless-ness concerning the larger advantages and wider doors of the kingdom of God until the ground has been preoccupied. The earth is being ruled by the politician and the financier. Our failure, to whatever extent we have failed, has not been due to a lack of advantage. It has been due to a lack of foresight and the spirit of courage and execution. There is no denying the fact that our teaching has been to a very great extent contracted and narrow, sadly lacking in that scope and vigor, that breadth and variety and that adaptability and progressiveness that the gospel inspires and the modern age demands.

The Estey Tone is peculiar to the Estey Instruments, either pians or organ, and is superior in sweet and musical qualities, combined with great depth and brilliancy.

Addresses Delivered at the Funeral of Alexander Procter

Independence, Mo., July 24

A PRINCE IN ISRAEL.

BY J. H. GARRISON.

My FRIENDS:-That which we all knew must come, sooner or later, that which we have recently anticipated as being near at hand, and that which we have dreaded more than he has at last come to pass: Alexander Procter has gone from us. "He is not here; he is risen." To his threescore and ten years, allowed by the psalmist as the ordinary limit of human life, were added five golden years -a sort of aftermath, when the real harvest had been gathered; a glow of radiance at the eveningtime, when the sun has run his course and is about to depart. But at last the end has come, as come it must to all of us, and we are here-friends, neighbors, brethren-not to weep over an untimely departure, not to sorro as those who have no hope, not to lament a life which we wish might have been different from what it was, as we sometimes do, but to place a few flowers—some simple "forget-me-nots"—on the grave of one we loved, and to express our appreciation of his noble character, of his unselfish labors and of the influence of his life and thought upon the cause he loved and served so long.

For more than forty years the name of Alexander Procter has been familiar to the brotherhood with which his life and labors were identified. The announcement of his decease on the 24th inst., although not unexpected, will cause a feeling of sadness and loneliness in thousands of hearts. Born in Kentucky, he came to Missouri when a boy and became rooted in her soil, and while his heart was large enough to take in the whole brotherhood, the whole Union, and even the whole world, there was to him no place like old Missouri. From here he went to Bethany College in his young manhood, spending three years under the instruction and inspiration of the great reformer, Alexander Campbell. Graduating in that institution, he returned to the state of his adoption, and among the people he loved so well he lived and labored and died, and in her soil his dust will repose. Known and loved by a large circle of people outside the state who had come in contact with him in one way or another, he was most highly prized and loved by those in his own state, who knew him best and who came into closest touch with his great heart and mind and felt the influence of his lovely character.

In connection with the departure of Alexander Procter one naturally recalls the words of David to his royal household on the day of Abner's death: "Know ye not that there is a prince and a great man fallen this day in Israel?" It is no exaggeration to say of this distinguished brother that he was an intellectual and spiritual prince among men and that he was a great man—great in his intellectual resources, great in the breadth and reach of his thought, great in his heart-power, great in his faith, and greatest of all in the loveliness and beauty of his character. These qualities made him a great preacher—a man of commanding influence among his brethren.

Those who knew Brother Procter best, if asked to mention his chief characteristic as a man and as a preacher of the gospel. would probably say that he was a great thinker-a man who refused to be satisfied with superficial reasoning, and who desired to get down to foundation facts and principles. His was a philosophical mind, seeking for the causes of things and ever trying to ascertain the general laws or principles underlying every great subject. His mind was intuitional rather than logical. He saw truth by a flash of insight, and recognized it and declared it without always knowing the steps by which he had reached the conclusion. Comparing him with New Testament writers, his style was like John's rather than that of Paul. Like John, he saw truth in its essence and drew very sharp contrasts. With him, as with John, the great truth was the Christhood and divine Sonhship of Jesus of Nazareth, and the great lie was the denial of that truch. He was comparatively careless about the logical forms of reasoning, which often constitute a refuge for partial truths, and was impatient with all labored processes of reasoning, which resulted in conclusions that he felt were at war with fundamental and essential truths and universal princi-

He loved truth more than all things else because he felt that truth is what humanity needs. His mind was singularly open to new and larger views of truth. He did not fear investigation. He never believed for a moment that he had discovered all the truth, but was in constant quest of new truth that would give him a larger view of God and of his universe. He had no fears that the revelations of science could ever harm the revelations of God in His Word, for the God of nature is the God of revelation. He had no misgivings as to the result of modern biblical criticism, because he knew that truth could not be harmed by criticism, and truth was all he desired. He believed that the Bible would be a more valuable book because better understood by all the light which modern critical investigation could throw upon it. This is a larger, a stronger, a serener faith in God and in his truth than that which trembles for fear that criticism will undermine the people's confidence in the Bible and destroy its authority.

Because his love for truth led him often into new fields of thought, and to accept, tentatively, at least, conclusions which many of his brethren were not prepared to accept, and because of that peculiar constitution of his mind to which we have referred, by which he perceived truth by a flash of intuition rather than as the result of logical reasoning, he was often misunderstood by his brethren, who feared his faith in the fundamental truths of the gospel was giving way. Never was there a greater mistake than this! No man ever believed in God and in the revelation of God through his Son, Jesus Christ, and in the eternal verities of the spiritual universe with a clearer and stronger faith than did Alexander Procter. Indeed, he lived "as seeing Him who is invisible." He saw God in all the manifold phenomena of the material world-in the glory of the rising and setting sun; in the outgoings of the morning and of the evening; in the majestic movements of the clouds; in the springing grass and in the blooming flowers. He had a poetic soul, which saw beauty everywhere, and recognized it all as the handiwork of his Heavenly Father. He read God's goodness and wisdom in the blush of the rose, in the blue azure of the skies and in all the multiform manifestations of life about him.

He saw God, too, in the great movements of human history. He believed that God is as much present in the world to-day as at any time in the distant past. He recognized his presence in the growing light that is driving darkness out of the world, and in the purer and juster laws and institutions established for the good of mankind. His faith in Jesus Christ as the revelation of God's grace and truth was supreme. No man could exalt Christ higher than he. Few men have had a truer insight into the character of Jesus than did our departed brother. As has been recently said of him, Jesus Christ was his great theme. He was fond of preaching from his great utterances. He seemed to enter profoundly into Christ's method of looking at life and the world. Christ's interpretation of God, of the spiritual world and of the kingdom of God, captivated his mind and heart, and he never wearied of telling others what these great conceptions were. In the zenith of his power few preachers have been able to move their audiences more profoundly than he, by the mastery of his thought, by the sublimity of his imagery, by his overwhelming array of great facts and principles bearing upon the point he was seeking to impress. Those of us who have heard him in these great discourses can never forget the strange sensations which swept over the soul under the spell of his sublime thought as he opened up to us in a new and startling way some great theme of the gospel.

Nor was it simply as a preacher that he poured forth the treasures of his thought. He was a great conversationalist, and some of the sublimest thoughts ever expressed by him were uttered in private conversation. At the fireside, or in the midst of a little group of congenial spirits, or with a single appreciative listener, he would utter sentiments clothed in befitting language which might well have appeared on the pages of a stately volume on theology or philosophy. He never seemed conscious that he was saying anything out of the ordinary line of conversation, so familiar was his mind with these loftier ranges of thought. He read the best books of the time. He kept in touch with the best thought of the age. This was the secret of his perennial freshness. This was why he could remain and preach a whole generation in one community. He never regarded his education as "finished," but looked forward hopefully, even joyfully, to entering upon new courses of study in the life beyond.

Bro. Procter had already accepted the principles of the Reformation, which had reached the new state of Missouri from Kentucky, before he went to Bethany College to sit at the feet of Alexander Campbell. These principles he thoroughly accepted, and while he may have differed from some of his brethren on some of the minor doctrinal points, he never for a moment wavered as to the truthfulness and value to the world of that conception of Christianity which was embodied and set forth in the Reformation of the nineteenth century. He believed in the union of God's people, for he loved good men and women everywhere without regard to sectarian lines. He believed that union could only be consummated by returning to the simplicity of Christ, and seeking unity in Him rather than in doctrinal speculations. He was too broad a man for any sectarian limitations and could never have consented to wear even the badge of a denominational name. He insisted on having free access to the whole wide field of Christian thought, and utterly disregarded those artificial barriers which men have erected, parceling out truth to this and that sect, as if a Christian was not entitled to it all. He loved his brethren tenderly and passionately. Nothing but sickness could ever prevent him from meeting with his brethren in their state and national conventions. No one of us in Missouri ever expected him to be absent from our annual state convention, if he were able to be there. He was deeply interested in all our missionary, educational and benevolent enterprises. His heart went out in the full tide of sympathy with every movement and every enterprise that looked in the direction of the elevation of men. How we shall miss him, brethren, in our annual assemblies! He will meet with us no more, in bodily presence, but the influence of his life and personality will abide with us forever, as an imperishable legacy.

I am glad he was spared to the good old age to which he lived—glad for his sake, glad for ours. It was a source of unfailing joy to him that he lived long enough to see the religious movement to which he had devoted the energies of his life pass safely by some of the dangers which threatened it in earlier years, and moving forward with leaps and bounds. It gave him great hope for the future to see so many true, educated young men coming forward to carry on the work which he was soon to lay down. It was no small boon to our cause in the state of Missouri that such a man as Bro. Procter was permitted to live and labor among us for more than half a century. Great menmen who are great in goodness-are God's best gifts to any people. The impress of his thought, the influence of his character, time can never efface. Your community here is richer in every way that a man so pure in life, so noble in thought, so gentle in all his dealings with men, should have gone in and out before you for so long a period of time. It cannot be otherwise than that the young people growing up to manhood and womanhood in this community will aspire to attain a nobler type of character, because Alexander Procter lived and wrought here so many years, and going hence has left the influence of his life like a gracious benediction to abide with you.

To the family how much his life and character mean! These are cherished by them much more than gold and silver, or stocks and bonds. While all our hearts go out to them in tenderest sympathy at their loss of his personal presence they are none the less to be congratulated on the glorious ending of a life so rich in good deeds, high thoughts and lofty ideals. May the blessing and peace of God, in whom he trusted and with whom he walked in closest fellowship, abide with them forever!

But, having accomplished his great work, it is well that he could go home and rest from all his weariness. He loved life. To him the earth was a beautiful place in which to live. He loved men. He could see their good points and proclivities when duller eyes could see nothing praiseworthy. He loved childhood with a tenderness like that of the Master. With Jean Paul Richter he could say: "I love God and little children." But his love was even broader than that, for he loved all men. But loving life, and taking joy in all its beauty and tender relationships, he had no fear of death. In his faith to die was to pass out of the bondage of the material into the true liberty of the children of God. As we once heard him say, he seemed to be passing through a tunnel here in the flesh, and death was passing out of the dark tunnel into the broad, beautiful sunlight of God's eternal day.

Peacefully, calmly, trustingly, he fell asleep without a struggle, without a doubt, without a fear. Let us not mourn that he has gone from us and passed up higher to enter into the fellowship of those elect spirits whom he had known on earth, and the larger company of the redeemed who are before the throne, having washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. There, to-day, amid the company of the glorified, among the tall sons of light, he stands with a radiance on his face brighter than that which illumined it even here, still pursuing his favorite theme, ascribing glory and honor and dominion and power to Him who was, who is, and who is to come.

Every person has two educations—one which he receives from others, and one more important, which he gives himself.

NOBILITY OF CHARACTER.

A. B. JONES.

Death is always eventful. Come when it may, how it may or to whom it may, it always means a change, a mighty change, a reconstruction, a readjustment, a revolution. It means all this to the man himself—this mortal shall put on immortality, the natural body shall become a spiritual body; time is exchanged for eternity. An exchange of worlds! What a revolution! A young man determines to leave his native state, his home and all his early associations and go to the Far West where opportunities for growth and development are greater, where ambition may find a larger sphere. All preparations are made and the time to start on his journey arrives. It now flashes upon his soul what all this means. In silence he walks out to view for the last time the scenes of his childhood. He looks into the garden, walks through the orchard, strolls over the meadow and over the fields, wanders through the woods and along the stream, looks up at the sky and the floating clouds -what emotions! He returns to the home and looks sadly around the yard at the green grass, the flowerbeds, the shade trees; he enters the house, looks around at the furniture, at the pictures on the wall and at the old clock on the mantel-his heart is full to breaking. He must now kiss his mother and say good-bye to father, to brothers and sisters, and turn his back on all these things forever. What a change, what a trial! Death means all this and much more. To a man like Alexander Procter, who loved nature, in whose face he always saw God smiling, who could talk with the stars, with the ocean, the lakes, the rivers, the mountains, the forests, the fields: who loved his own sweet home with its majestic shade trees, its orchards and vineyards of his own planting and training, its green grass and its smiling flowers; who loved his family, his neighbors, his church; who loved all mankind and everything as he knew them here on this earth and in this life-what a change, what a mighty change, to close his eyes forever on all these things! But death means a change, a reconstruction, a revolution, not only to the man himself but to his family. This family can never be the same again. The head is gone, that great heart is still, the magnet is removed and the particles gathered about it must fall apart.

The death of Bro. Procter means a change—an appreciable change—to this church, to this whole community and to our church throughout this state. We shall all miss him. That majestic form will no longer grace our conventions, that eloquent tongue will no more inspire our assembled hosts. The great army will have to do battle without its accustomed leader. A reconstruction, a readjustment, becomes necessary all around. But the unseen hand will still guide us all.

The importance of the change wrought by death is determined largely by the importance of the man who dies. Measured by this standard, I shall not attempt to portray to you the magnitude of the events involved in the death of Alexander Procter. I leave your imagination to conceive of these in all the broad sweep of their implied revolutions and reconstructions.

Alexander Procter was a splendid specimen of an all-around man. In her happiest mood nature cast him in her best mold. Physically, he was a powerful man. His body, while not compact or symmetrical, was massive and always commanding in its presence. The same may be said of his mind-not compact, not close or logical in its methods, but immense in its strength, in its grasp and in its sweep. His fund of information, both general and special, was always a surprise and a source of profit and pleasure to his friends. Nor was he any less a giant in his moral character. Had Bro. Procter never been brought under the influence of religion he would still have stood erect among men and been recognized as a moral hero. Nature made him that way. He was so organized that he never could have learned the way of success in business, as many men have, through hook and crook, by indirection and circumvention. His soul always grew indignant in the presence of such things. The plain and straight methods of honest and honorable dealings were all that he cared to know. In his moral make-up he blended two qualities rarely found associated together in menthe strength of a lion and the gentleness of a woman. This latter quality was the dominant one of his life. It required the presence of great provocations and important moral issues to arouse the lion in his nature. But it was always there.

But the most conspicuous and imposing part in the colossal character of Bro. Procter was his spiritual nature. He saw God in everything, and lived evermore in the presence of God. No man ever associated with him that did not feel the touch of his lofty, spiritual nature and did not feel inspired by it.

It has been emphasized that Bro. Procter loved his brethren ardently. Let me add that his brethren loved him with equal devotion. This fact has been manifested in many ways. I recall now a few times in which the committee on program for our state convention decided, contrary to their custom, to fill the program without a sermon from Bro. Procter. But before the convention was over there would arise such a clamor among the people that special arrangements had to be made for a sermon from him in some other church of the town, and the crowd always followed him.

Bro. Procter was an advanced thinker. He was always ahead of his brethren in this respect. I recall the first time I ever heard him preach. It was at our state convention in Lexington, Mo., in 1856. His thoughts then were beyond my reach fully ten years. In his epistle to the Hebrews Paul says: "These all died in faith, not having received the promises, but they saw them afar off, and were persuaded f them, and embraced them." The apostle said this referring back to what he had just written concerning Abel, Enoch, Noah and Abraham. "By faith Abel offered unto God a more excellent sacrifice than Cain." these two brothers there was a chasm. Cain worshiped in a material, sensual, mechanical way. His religion was a matter of business with him, and as such he ground through its forms. Abel was a spiritual man, and it was "by faith he offered unto God a more excellent sacrifice than Cain. through which he had witness borne to him that he was righteous." The same broad, deep chasm lay between Enoch and the perverse men of his generation. They were sensual, earthly, time-serving, while "Enoch walked with God and was not, for God took

"By faith Noah, being warned of God concerning thing not seen as yet, prepared an ark to the saving of his house." What a difference between this man and the mass of people who listened to his preaching and watched him on high scaffolds building his ark. The difference lay in their spiritual understanding of things—in their faith.

And then: "By faith Abraham, when he was called, obeyed to go out unto a place which he was to receive for an inheritance; and he went out not knowing whither he went." The people looked at the old man and wondered. They did not comprehend his methods or his movements. In some such way have we not all been studying Alexander Procter? In that first sermon I heard him preach in 1856. I listened and wondered, but comprehended not, After ten years of further study and thought and growth on my part I reached an understanding of that sermon. But when I came to the house he then built I saw him building another one ten years ahead of me again. Again I toiled on and climbed up to this house, but only to find Bro. Procter gone still higher. During the last ten years of his life and preaching he has been beyond my reach. I have not understood him, and I am now too old and feeble to climb any higher. I shall never in this life understand him. That he saw the relations and bearings of his later views, and that he could articulate them with the plain, fundamental truths of our holy religion, I shall not question. Whatever we may think of his views of these matters, no man who knew Alexander Procter can believe it possible for that marvelous spiritual nature to cut itself loose from God the Father and Christ Jesus the Savior of men. Let us rather think of him as among those of whom Paul says: "These all died in faith, not having received the promises, but saw them afar off, and were persuaded of them, and embraced them."

One more word. It has been said by a preceding speaker that Bro. Procter's life has been a benediction to this church in Independence. I wish to say that his life has been in a still more impressive way a benediction to his family. It is an honor to be the wife of such a man as Alexander Procter. It is an honor to be the son of such a man or to be his daughter. And henceforth, wherever Sister Procter may travel in Missouri, and is introduced as the wife of Bro. Procter, the hearts of her brethren and sisters will all be tenderly touched, and she will be graciously received into their hearts and their homes. And wherever and whenever this son shall go abroad his introduction as the son of Bro. Procter will be a favorable passport to the confidence and respect of the people. Wherever these three daughters may go the sympathy and affection of the churches of Christ await them. Having received such honor, see that it is sacredly preserved and maintained. And may God add his blessing to this benediction.

Between Calvary and Olivet.

C. H. WETHERBE.

There are some very interesting thoughts suggested by the life Christ between Calvary and Olivet, or the forty days which lay between Christ's death and ascension.

One thought which impresses me is that from the time that Christ arose from the dead until he ascended to heaven he was not subject to any persecution nor to any trouble whatever from his enemies. He was being led about during all of that time by his foes. They said that he had not arisen from the tomb, but that his body had been stolen from the grave by his disciples; yet, not a single enemy had a chance to personally meet and abuse him. He had gotten through being spit upon and otherwise misused by sinners. He had borne an unspeakable amount of vilest treatment from sinners for several years, but during those forty days he had a sweet, delightful rest from abusive and lawless sincers. What a great change that was! Why was it that Christ was free from opposition and mistreatment by his foes during that time? It was because he did not appear before them, and hence he did not give them a chance to misuse him. Whenever he appeared before men it was his own disciples that he met.

In 1 Cor. 15:6 Paul states that Christ, after he arose from the dead, "appeared to above five hundred brethren at once." And notice that those people were Christ's "brethren." He did not show himself to an enemy after his resurrection. There was no communion between him and his foes after he had been glorified by his death. Not an unconverted soul had the privilege of seeing Christ during those days of rest. It was his brethren and sisters who enjoyed such a great privilege. It was to his friends and not to his enemies that Christ revealed himself during his restful six weeks and more. Christ did what he told his disciples a few day before his death that he would do, that he would manifest himself to them, and not to the world. At that time he said: "He that loveth me shall be loved of my Father and I will love him, and will manifest myself unto him." understood these words to mean that the time was coming when Christ would manifest himself exclusively to his disciples, his own people, for he said: "Lord, what is come to pass that thou wilt manifest thyself unto us and not unto the world?" What occurred during those forty days will be repeated only on a broader scale after this dispensation shall have closed; only Christ's own people will be with him in heaven; the worldly-minded, the ungodly will not be there. Then will God's people be eternally seperated from sinners and forever at rest.

Tributes to Alexander Procter

The Young Preacher's Friend.

I wish to bear testimony to Bro. Procter's kindly consideration for his younger brethren. Although a giant in intellect and soul, the humblest of his brethren found him as simple and unaffected as a child, approachable and full of kindly, helpful words. He was too great to be haughty or proud.

A Man of Kindness.

Our Bro. Procter is not dead, but liveth forevermore. I can never forget his kindness to me.
His last words of advice were to preach Christ.

A Magnificent Life.

I have known Alexander Procter since his St. I have known Alexander Procter since his St. Louis pastorate. Conducted a Sunday-school in the basement of the church there at the time. His was a magnificent life. Amid weakness and pain he builded a character, pure, noble, grand, worthy his towering intellect, the age in which he lived, and the Master whom he humbly and supremely leved and served.

His Life Not Encompassed by Eulogies.

I greatly desire to be counted among the many who knew and loved the great and good Alexander who knew and loved the great and good alexander. For more than 25 years I have known him well. It is doubtful whether any words of appreciation or eulogy will be spoken by those who knew him best that I cannot endorse. His was a Christian life without a flaw in his armor or a stain upon his shield. F. M. Green. or a stain upon his shield. Kent, O.

No Fear of Death.

I met Bro. Procter and heard him speak at a a number of conventions, but our personal fellowship was for only one day. The memory of that day is as fragrant as a day lily. Let me lay it upon his grave. Among other things he said: "I look upon death as only the lifting of the latch and the stepping from this humble cabin into our Father's house of many mansions."

High Appreciation of the Christian Ministry

As one whom Bro. Procter assisted in ordaining to the Christian ministry I wish to lay this flower of grateful remembrance upon his grave. It was of grateful remembrance upon his grave. It was here in this church, built during my first term of service, on May 24, 1885, that Bro. Procter, Bro. T. P. Haley and Chaplain J. B. McCleary ordained me by fasting, prayer and the laying on of hands. In all the years since I have loved and honored Bro. Procter and have tried to carry out the high ideals of the Christian ministry which he on that day sought to impress on my mind. God be praised for such men as Alexander Procter.

A Genius, A Poet, A Philosopher,

"Now is the strong staff broken and the beautiful rod." Before the minds of all who knew him the image of the immortal Procter will stand With joy unspeakable and full of glory forever. he has entered the golden portal to receive at the hands of all that blessed company a welcome to the bliss that never fades, but behind him he has left for us a rich, a glorious heritage. mas left for us a rich, a glorious heritage. In mind he was a genius, in soul a poet, in nature a philosopher, in character a Christian and in all things worthy of the highest eulogy. He was the leader of a vast school in the university of thought, the power of which is just beginning to take hold of the theological world. Oh, how we pray for the coming light! From doctrines and dogmas, from men and things he called the world to a higher faith, that should have for its center and its hough the over higher, and glorified Christ. and its hope the ever-living and glorified Christ, and from the clustering virtues which his life shall ever be exhaled a fragrance all divine.

Conformed to the Divine Image.

There are few now living who knew Alexander Procter a greater length of time or more inti-mately than I did. I knew him from his early ministry through all the years of his life to the end, and I do not hesitate to say that in a long life of observation and experience in the world and in the church I have not met with any one whose entire life was so nearly in conformity with the divine model as was his. It was a great life, a beautiful life, and it remains to-day enbalmed in love in the minds and hearts of thous-ands of men and women who have felt its influence on their own lives.

A Man of Magnetic Power.

I met this noble man first about 27 years ago, at Louisiana, Mo. Having read a paper there, he was the first to commend it and welcome me as an Illinois preacher. Since then I was the editor of his lectures, and as such sat under his trees day by day, as he passed them through revision. The last time I saw him, about a year ago, dinner with me, in my home here, and talked of the ever-present God under my trees. Although often engaged with him in friendly discussion I loved him as I love no one else in Missouri. I can not help that. He drew me and my wife to him as no one else did. My boys all but worshiped him. I have sat at his feet and learned of him. He has broadened my soul, and I acknowledge my-self hi debtor. J. W. Monser. self hi debtor.

A Member of the State Board.

Another prince in Israel has fallen, and this time the blow has come to our state mission work very hard, for Alexander Procter has been a member of the state board almost from its very birth, and indeed from the very beginning of our mission work in the state he has been closely identified with it all. No man was ever more faithful in his attendance at the board meetings. Not one ever gave larger or more intelligent in-terest to the winning of Missouri for Jesus than did he. Ever since I became secretary he has been one of my very dearest friends. When weary, discouraged and grieved he was always weary, discouraged and grieved he was always ready with his expressions of encouragement and cheer. Personally I owe him a debt beyond my power of payment. May I be worthy of all his confidence indeed and may the brotherhood whom he loved carry on with greater vigor the work that lay so near his heart.

Saw the Divine in Humanity.

I would bring my tribute of love and praise to the memory of one whose absence means personal loss to every one enlisted in our restoration movement. All who came within the charmed circle of Bro. Procter's acquaintance had a realizing sense of the wonderful magnetic force that drew all hearts toward him. I believe this was due to the fact that he saw the divine in humanity as few people see it. He intuitively saw the best in each human soul, and he possessed the tact to say the kindly thing, to speak the word of praise that begot within each an earnest desire to live up to their highest and best, to be indeed worthy of what he thought them to be. To every soul I suppose there comes days of darkness when the very heavens seem as brass and the way closes in very nearens seem as brass and the way closes in as with a pall. Fortunate is he if at such a time he can enter the inspiring presence of a man of love like Bro. Procter, a man capable of offering a consolation so divine as to occasion a spiritual uplift and make one feel it a joy to suffer to call out such matchless sympathy. I bade him a last farewell in June, his voice was almost too feeble for utterance, but there was no far off look in the therance, but there was no lar on look in the failing eyes; simply a joyous expectancy as he sat waiting for that "divine event to which the whole creation moves," for to him dying meant homegoing, happiness and the Father's house.

He has gone and "the silence aches around us," but in the midst of our sorrow we rejoice that the world is better the way is brighter. The unward world is better, the way is brighter. The upward pathway seems less steep because of the rare in-fluence of the life of Alexander Procter.

Faith in Things Not Seen.

The heart that attempts a worthy tribute to the memory of Alexander Procter, is summoned to a heavy task. Nothing that one can say will add neavy task. Nothing that one can say will add to his good name or enlarge the measure of our sincere and lasting esteem. His character is be-yond the reach of either praise or blame. The secret of his beautiful life and fascinating dis-course, whether in the pulpit or in the social circle, was his faith in the INVISIBLE. To thoughtful people and those in trouble his sermons were an inspiration and helpful to a degree beyond those of any other preacher of his generation. This little flower is laid on his grave in changeless love and in adoring gratitude.

His Optimism.

One of the most striking characteristics of the many-sided sage of Independence was his gentle optimism. I never heard a despondent word from his lips. Not that he was blind to the strife going on between good and evil—false and true—all about him. He was painfully conscious of human about him. He was paintury conscious of numan infirmity, suffering and sin; and no heart ever beat with a truer sympathy for the victims of misfortune. But he had a sublime confidence in the permanence of truth, the final victory of right, and he had the noble faculty of imparting his faith to No man could come under the spell of his others. great mind and generous heart without seeing the sun break through the clouds and feeling ever after with gentle Pippa in Browning's sweet story: "God's in his heaven;

All's right with his world."

Thank God for the hope-inspiring ministry of our beloved Bro. Procter.

W. F. RICHARDSON.

A Fountain of Knowledge.

I wish to express my high regard for the life and character of Alexander Procter. He impress-ed all who came in contact with him with his consecration and his largeness. He was great enough to be simple, humble and childlike, that is, great enough to be fit for the kingdom of heaven. No man in all my association with men more profoundly moved me. He was a majestic man, an imperial man in all that constitutes the noblest manhood. Once I spent a day in his home. His talk under the oaks and under the stars was like talk under the oaks and under the stars was like Alphonso Karr's "Tour in My Garden" and the "Memorabilia" combined. Another time we walked over Kansas City together, just after a cyclone had swept it. Again, at Marshalltown I sat with him and G. W. Longan on a lawn for two hours and listened. Again, at a convention in Kansas City, Kan., and last at Indianapolis. These especially among many. In every case these interviews are indelicly fixed on my mind and heart and heart.

It was a high privilege to know him. It gave any one a more exalted conception of God and man. He is worthy to stand with the tallest seraph. F. D. POWER.

A Friend and Connselor.

In 1873 I became connected with Woodland College, Independence, Mo. Alexander Procter, who had been my father's friend since they met as boys at Bethany College, became my friend and counselor. For years I sat under his power-ful pulpit ministrations and during those years alful pulpit ministrations and during those years almost weekly in his home. I became the teacher of his children and he became my teacher. Go when I would with a question, however difficult, I found him willing and ready. I think I knew him as well as a lesser mind could know a greater one. He was preacher, theologian, philosopher, poet, naturalist all in one. His thoughts were beautiful, deep, devout. He soared, he delved, he worshiped. He towered above his fellows, yet the humblest had sweet and helpful fellowship with him humblest had sweet and helpful fellowship with him. It can be truthfully said of him that he was theophilanthropic. Selfishness, jealousy and littleness found no place in his manly breast. He was good in his greatness and great in his goodness.

"Sweet promptings unto kindest deeds Were in his very look;

We read his face as one who reads A true and holy book.

His great mind moved in charity, rested in providence and turned upon the poles of truth.

Atlanta, Ill., Aug. 2, 1900.

Singularly sincere and simple, his life was serenely beautiful and trustful. His conception of Christ was truly inspiring, and he loved and preached him with all the wealth of his great loving heart. His masterful and beneficent ministry far overreached our own brotherhood.

The citizens of the great state of Missouri, without respect to creed or condition, owe him an everlasting debt of gratitude. Blessed man! Blessed memories! I thank God for both.

The Message of Bro. Procter.

It was no disparagement to any hero of Greece to say that while Ulysses was absent no one was able to bend his bow. Bro. P is no more among us. He bent his own bow. It was strong and massive. It gained a rich living for those who sat at his board. In attempting to give a brief account of his work I disclaim comparison or disparagement. I do not know that I can do my subject the smallest justice, but I can give a few impressions. It is worthy a more facile pen.

To account for the message of Bro. P. one must first take into considera ion the student. Before Bro. P. could answer questions for others he was compelled to answer them for himself He gave out visions as he saw them. His four great subjects were God, Christ, man and nature. He studied the Bible, history and science. Current events as an evolution of the past never failed to He considered the Bible the Book Interest him. of books, but did not exalt it to a fetich. was great gain, to the race in the Lutheran Reforwas great gain, to the race in the latest at telestimation, but one of its ultimate effects was to substitute the Bible for the Pope. This was a great gain but not enough. Christ should have been the substitute. If ever there was a man who preached Christ, no one can make that claim above Bro. P. He was not a text preacher nor a word juggler. He did not depreciate the Bible, but he had a higher appreciation of God and his Christ. Judged by his pulpit readings there were portions of Scripture which were special Those that spoke of abundant life, of favorites. freedom from law, of perfect faith, of human transfiguration, had great attraction for him. He rarely ever read from the historic portions of the Old Testament. As well as I can remember when-ever he took up the Old Bible it opened for him almost spontaneously at Psa. 19, or 23, or 90, or the later chapters of Isaiah. If his readings were from the New Testament he would select those passages fullest of the sayings of the Master. The Sermon on the Mount was an inexhaustible storehouse for him. I think John was his favor-ite biographer. I do not remember in a long time to have heard him read from or comment on the Acts. His favorite epistles were Ephesians, Colossians, Philippians, James and Peter, but Romans 8 and 1 Cor. 13 and 15, and 2 Cor. 5, held equal claims with the most favored portion. If he had his favorite portions of Scripture he alse had favorite passages. I can still hear him saying: "Who shall separate us." etc. We know not what we shall be," etc. "Till we all come in the unity of the faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ." Of course, it will be known that the selections given above are not a complete catalogue of his preferences, but a few that I recall with less effort. In fact, they report themselves without effort. The passages he loved were descriptive possibilities and outcome of life. of the great Based on his faith, that a man was made in the image of God, he believed the promises and tried to open the eyes of his generation to the splen did heritage of every man. Listening to him for so long a time on these magnificent themes, when he died I felt like my line of communication had been cut.

I said above that Bro. P. was a student of science. With his responding brain how could he be otherwise? He was a great admirer of Darwin and Spencer. These men served only to make him more profoundly religious. He found it easier to believe the theory of creation by evolution than that by "fiat," and some of his most glorious outlooks were obtained from the elevated positions given to thought by these men. His study of nature was a source of most leautiful illustration. I remember his using a bulb and then the flower that came from it to illustrate the transfiguration. A few days since I gave the following estimate in an interview: "That which made Bro. P. of such service in almost every sphere of life was his strong, liberal, broad mind. His thought was comprehensive. He never saw any subject by sections. He used God to explain the world and Christ to explain man. ing his stand upon the Rock of Ages, he preached a general good news to all the world.

As far as I could see there was not the slightest trace of pessimism in his nature." His study of the progressive order of creation: how the mineral was lifted to the vegetable, how the vegetable was lifted to the animal and animal to man-this study made him, makes any man an optimist. And we cannot help seeing that man is being lifted through Christ up to God. Like Drummond, the study of nature's order gave a larger, finer conception of the spiritual world. Bro. Procter did not preach science, but he preached a Christianity enlarged and enriched by sublime contemplation of the universe. When he rose from his investiof the universe. When he rose from his investigation he could say with the psalmist: "The heavens declare the glory of God and the firmament sheweth his handy work." When he saw that each dying age always gave "anticipation" of the one to come, it filled him with hope for humanity and he would say: "It doth not appear what we shall be how we know that when he shall be what we shall be, but we know that when he shall appear we shall be like him." He would point to Jesus and say: "Behold the coming man." Bro. Procter's soul was anchored to God and Christ and he tried to brush away everything that ob-If at the close of his own life scured his view. he realized what he had so often told to others, then he entered into joy and the sublime visions of the new heaven and a new earth and a pure river of water of life, clear as a crystal proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb, became his forevermore and his soul received the richest interpretation of that revelation which "They shall see his face; and his name shall their foreheads." Christian Heroism.

Below we publish a private letter by permission from one of our missionaries in India. We do this that our readers may know of conditions in the famine districts of India and also of the problems which our missionaries have to meet in that field. It is enough to move a heart of stone to see the heroism displayed in this letter by Bro. C. and other of our missionaries. Surely, we ought to gladly give of our abundance for the support of such servants of humanity and of God and for such a work.—Editor.

Landour, N. W. P., India, May 10, 1900.

DEAR BRO. PAYNE:—Your letter of some days ago was laid aside until I should come up to the hills. I am here now, for just how long I don't know. I thank you very much for your kind words. I shall be glad if I in a measure can prove worthy of them.

prove worthy of them.

I am much pleased to see a cut of your new place of business and to learn of your prosperity. I would be glad to call in and see you. But if your prosperity continues you will have grown corpulent before the time comes for this pleasure. When I left Hurda it was from 108° to 112° in the shade. Here it is so cool in the house that my hand is not in very good condition for writing. It is a real blessing to be able to get away from the heat for awhile. I have never come up here, however, entirely for rest, I put in a good part of the time studying the language.

I am having grain sold cheaply in several villages by our helpers. I buy it and sell it at a loss. The famine people are very glad to get it in this way. We hope that they may recognize something of the gospel of love in this. We expect to buy seed grain for some of them later. In our district of 150,000 people 55,000 are on relief works, and many who are not on relief works are in a very poor condition, some for instance are selling the roofs from their houses. Thousands of these people are now living on one and a half and two cents a day. This is poverty! We don't know what it is to be poor as these people do here. But much of this is the fruit of heathenism.

In our own immediate district there are v ry few actually starving to death, although a good many are getting poorer every day for lack of food and will easily fall a prey to disease. In some other parts suffering is more severe and more are starving to death. Also cholera has broken out in some of the relief camps and from 150 to 200 persons are found dead of this dread disease nearly every morning. They die in a night or in a few hours. I have seen no cholera during this famine, but I have been all about the smallpox. I have been in a hand's reach of them several times. I have wondered what people at home would do if they suddenly found themselves in the presence of smallpox or cholera. The average person, perhaps, would not not remain long. But our work takes us where these diseases are and we cannot flee and be faithful to our work. So we do not dwell on the danger, but rather on duty. Give my "salams" to your brothers and other friends of mine whom you may meet.

I hope you may be continue to prosper both in spiritual and temporal things. Our work generally is moving some.

Sincer-ly,
G. W. COFFMAN.

B. B. Tyler Wrong for Once.

I read B. B. Tyler's letters uniformly with pleasure, and sometimes with delight, but his last in the Christian-Evangelist of July 26 closes with a piece of advice to which I must take exception. He says:

James Lane Allen's new book, "The Reign of Law," published by the Macmillan Company, New York, is a good book to read in this connection. It has a bearing on the questions here raised. It is much the best piece of work that Mr. Allen has given to the public. Read, as soon as possible, "The Reign of Law."

B. B. T.

I am sure that Bro. Tyler had not read the book through, or that he had read some parts of it very inattentively, or he would not have given this piece of advice. The culmination of the arguments and reflections which Mr. Allen puts in the mouth of his hero and which are doubtless his own is expressed in the two following paragraphs:

graphs:

"Buddha's faith or Brahma's were no more direct from God than Buhdistic or Brahman temples were from God; the Koran is no more inspired than Moorish architecture is inspired; the ancient religion of the Jews stands on the same footing as the other great religions of the globe, as to being supernatural; the second religion of the Hebrews, starting out of them, but rejected by them, the Christian religion, the greatest of all to us, takes its place with the others as a perfectly natural expression of the same human desire and effort to find God and to worship him through all the best that we know in ourselves and of the universe outside of us" (p. 294).

"If you ask me whether I believed in the God of the Hebrews, I say, Yes; just as I believe in the God of the Babylonians, of the Egyptians, of the Greeks, of the Romans, of all men. But if you ask me whether I believe what the Hebrews wrote of God or what any other age or people thought of God, I say, No. I believe what the best thought of my own age thinks of him in the light of man's whole past and of our greater present knowledge of the laws of his universe" (p. 296).

Here you see plainly what "reign of law" this novel is intended to set forth. Bro. Tyler is the last man to purposely recommend such teaching to the readers of his popular letters.

It may be well for me to add that Mr. Allen represents his hero, David, who is evidently made up partly of himself and partly of W. B. Smith, well known in Missouri while a professor in Missouri University as having been a student of the College of the Bible, becoming an infidel while a student and being expelled for his infidelity. I suppose that a novelist is at liberty in the main to make up his facts and persons to suit himself; but when he designates real institutions by name, and gives dates, and points out persons as plainly as if their names were given, he should feel bound to tell the truth about them. Now, neither he, nor W. B. Smith, nor any other person corresponding to his David was ever a student of the Bible. It is possible, I think, for a boy as green and illogical as he represents his David to have been to fall under evil influences and become an infidel while daily studying the Scriptures; but fortunately, the college of the Bible has had no such an experience as he ascribes to it.

Program Kansas convention this paper.

Church Extension Day first Sunday in Sepper.

A suitable offering for Church Extension canbe had without preparation.

Every pastor should send to G. W. Muckley, sas City, Mo., for supplies for Church Exion offering.

It is also time to begin to talk up the onal convention in the churches. Do not these conventions to come upon you unsees. A vast throng of people should be there, should not permit ourselves to be overowed by political conventions and interests.

The first Sunday in August was a red-letter for the Second Christian Church, this city. The were six additions to the church besides a liberal collection taken for the church debt, he will be reduced several hundred dollars month. In this offering the pastor, as usual, among the most liberal donors of the church. It is each by this account that all of the ren in St. Louis has not gone to the seashore ther resorts for the summer.

We had expected to give all the addresses at funeral of Bro. Procter in this paper, but us to delay in getting some of them to this e, we are able to give but two—that of the or and that of Bro. Jones. We have, however, ived a large number of tributes to his memory hich many of the many virtues of his life are cted. The remaining addresses will probably ear in our next issue. These tributes show widely and deeply the life of Alexander Proctuched his fellowmen—all who knew him or whom he came in contact in his long and all ministry. Only God can see and know the tence of such a life upon the world.

On the occasion of the 75th anniversary of cander Procter's birthday a negative of him in library was taken and photographs from this ative on heavy cardboard 11x14 are now offeror sale at $1 each, or larger ones (16x20) at each, all the proceeds of which are to be deed to the purchase of a suitable monument to nd at his grave. This will not only give to the nds of this grand man a good photograph of , but will contribute toward the erection of a ument to stand-not to perpetuate his memory: annot be effaced; not to honor his life: the life ors the monument - as a token of esteem in ch he is held by his friends. Let every one hing a photograph of either size, and wishing contribute toward this expression of esteem adss Mrs. Lillian Gwin, or M. C. Masters, Indedence, Mo.

-Five leading Sunday-school workers, repreting various denominations, have just made a r of the great Northwest under the auspices of International Sunday-school committee. They e held conventions in eleven states and proves, traveling in all about 8,000 miles each. members of the party, except the interional general secretary, contributed their vices voluntarily during this eight weeks' tour. s is only one of the ways in which the Interional Sunday-school work is helping the work all denominations everywhere. The expenses the tour were provided for by special contribun before the party started Details concernthe International Sunday-school work may be d by applying to the general secretary, Mr. rion Lawrence, Toledo, O.

- —The church at North Eaton, Ohio, has passed memorial resolutions in honor of H. W. Everest and John M. Atwater, who were once pastors of that church. These resolutions of esteem were unanimously adopted by the church.
- —During the month of July the Foreign Society received $14,556 41, a gain of $1,452.16 over the corresponding month last year. There was a gain, however, in the regular receipts of $3,237.16.
- —As E. J. Lampton will be absent from Louisiana, Mo., for a month or so, holding protracted meetings, he asks all applicants for the pulpit in that city to address the official board.
- —In the notice of the life of Sister Cline in our issue of July 26 it says that she was married to David Cline in 1850. It should have read 1854 instead of 1850. The picture is that of Sister Cline in the year 1861.
- —Star of the East is the name of a new church paper of eight pages published monthly in the interest of the churches of Eastern Pennsylvania and ably edited by H. F. Lutz, Harrisburg. We trust that the Star of the East may shine brightly, lead many to Christ and be a great light unto the churches of the district named.
- —The First Church of Christ, Plainfield, N. J., has had a summer of plesure in work. The at tendance is five times larger than it was Jan. 1, and the prayer-meetings, Friday evening and (women's) Wednesday afternoon, are well sustained. The work among the colored people is also progressing.
- —The church at Bethany, W. Va., is very desirous of employing a pastor and would be pleased to correspond with some of our preaching brethren who have children to educate. While the salary will not be large, they can offer free tution in the college and some other advantages. Address communications to C. B. Scott, Bethany, W. Va.
- —Dr. J. Harvey Moore, a noted occulist of this city, has this week forwarded to M. D. Adams, one of our missionaries in India, a package of medicine for a course of treatment free of charge. Bro. Adams had learned of Dr. Moore's success in the treatment of Bro. Calvin's eyes and has applied to him at this distance for treatment. Dr. Moore is a Presbyterian in religion, but his faith does not narrow his views, neither his philanthropies. He is interested in the cause of missions and missionaries regardless of denominational distinctions.
- The Shenandoah (Ia.) local papers very fully report a pleasant event in connection with the Church of Christ at that place. It seems that in the purchase of their parsonage, some years ago a mortgage of $1,000 was assumed. A few Sundays ago pastor J. H. Wright invited his people to sit in judgment upon a line of thought on "Church Finances" and decide whether it would be scriptural should he present it to "the church over the way." It was generally so considered, at which point he introduced his withheld text: "Thou art inexcusable, O man, whosover thou art that judgest; for wherein thou judgest another thou condemnest thyself," and urged that his congregation be careful to live up to these scriptural injunctions. It was determined to pay off the mortgage on the parsonage, and on July 27 a "jubilee social" was held, 300 attending and enjoying the free for-all cream and cake. At its close, the money needed being raised, the mortgage was canceled and burned amid rejoicing. The prompt response to this call for $1,030 ($30 interest), the regular weekly payment of his salary, the 23 accessions since February 1 and the cordial spirit manifested both within and without the church give the pastor reason for rejoicing.

- —A number of new missionaries will sail for Japan and India during September.
- —The Foreign Society has received no word from the missionaries in China during the past week. The officers of the society feel confident that the missionaries are safe, or they would receive cablegrams.
- —The 10th annual conventional of the Nodaway Valley district, Missouri, will be held at Grant City, August 28-30. All persons expecting to attend this convention are requested to send their names to W. H. Harris, Grant City, Mo. A good program is provided for the convention.
- —The Missionary Intelligencer for August treats at considerable length of the troubles in China. This substantial missionary magazine, always full of inspiring missionary news, ought to be a literary fixture in every Christian home.
- —We are glad to have so good a journal as the West Virginia Christian quote freely from our columns. It is careful to give due credit, which is greatly to its credit. The W. V. C. is starting out bravely in a good work and we wish it Godspeed in its important field.
- —A friend of Foreign Missions is arranging to turn over $2,500 to the Foreign Society in a short time on the annuity plan. This will make the annuity fund amount to about $92,500, or only $7,500 short of the $100,000 the society is hoping to reach for the annuity fund before September 30, when the books close. The society will receive any amount from $100 to $25,000 and pay a reasonable interest during life. For further particulars address F. M. Rains, Treasurer, Box 384, Cincinnati, O.
- —The convention of the 7th missionary district of Illinois will be held in Fairfield, Sept. 4-6. Those who expect to attend this convention are requested to send their names to J. A. Battenfield, Fairfield, Ill. A good program has been arranged for this convention.
- —The North American Review for August contains a symposium on the Chinese question. There are seven articles by strong writers on one or other of its many phases. Every person at all interested in this great problem should read each of these articles.
- —In the catalog of the Fayette Normal University, Fayette, O., for the year closing June 7, 1900, and announcement for 1900-1901, we find the name of J. Fraise Richard next to that of the president in the faculty. Prof. Richard has transferred all his interests from Washington, D. C., to this point and will co-operate in the management and upbuilding of the Fayette Normal University. Fayette is an ideal college town and Prof. Richard is abreast of the age in practical educational methods, and we predict increased popularity for the Fayette Normal under the leadership of President Palmer and Vice-President Richard.
- -Rem mber that all of August is needed for a proper preparation for the offering for Church Extension on the first Sunday in September. It will be no trouble to reach the quarter-million mark this year with anything like a hearty response on the part of the churches. We have but one Church Extension Board and but one annual offering for Church Extension, and hence the importance of attention and action. To miss out on this offering sets the work back a whole year; perhaps for all time. Do not fail to send a postal card to G. W. Muckley, Kansas City, Mo., for supplies for the September offering. You will need literature, collection envelopes, instructions, enthusiasm, material and fire to kindle it. Send at once for what you need. Remember that we have but one Church Extension Board, while the e are 127 evangelistic, district, state and national boards.

-All mail matter intended for any department of Add-Ran University should be directed to Hermoson, Tex.

-For the first 10 months of the current missionary year the Foreign Society has received $147,126.05, or a gain of $20,290.19. Let it be remembered that the books close for the current missionary year, September 30.

-The C. W. B M. convention of the first district, Missouri, will be held at Sturgeon, Aug. 14, 15. The Montgomery County convention will be held at New Florence, Aug. 16, 17. The second district C. W. B. M. convention will be held at La Belle, Mo., Aug. 16, 17. Let all interested parties take note.

-Writing of the cause in Rochester, N. Y., Steve Corey, pastor of the church there, says:

We will break ground for our new Sunday-school addition next week. Our church has been in existence three years and the work is growing nicely. Situated in the best part of the city for growth, we expect to have a strong work in the near future. It takes time to bring our plea before the people in conservative old Rochester, but some are accepting the truth with gladness.

Elder Peters has accepted a call to preach for the church in Washington, Ill., with the understanding that he is to finish his course in Eureka College in connection with his pastorate there. The church in Ra toul has prospered under the care of Bro. Peters and the church and people of the city will sincerely regret his de-

J. P. Myers, who has been for the past two years serving the Central Christian Church at Muncie, Ind., will close his work there October 1st, to enter Butler College for postgraduate work. During his two years' work there about 75 have been added to the church and all missionary offer-ings materially increased. The church is in good working order. Bro. Myers would be pleased to serve any church or churches within reach of Indianapolis.

Our Cause at Hot Springs, Ark.

A recent period of convalescence from typhoid fever found me, by direction of my physician, at Hot Springs, Ark. Of course, I found the sturdy little band of Disciples worshiping there, as what loyal Disciple would not? It did not take me long to discover that a heroic battle was being waged there by a devoted pastor and a loyal, earnest little flock. A good beginning has been made, and slow but sure progress. It was quite apparent that Hot Springs is a strategic point for our people. Hundreds if not thousands of Disciples visit the springs every year. Many of these are without means, sorely afflicted, looking to church benevolence for support while there, perhaps helped to this destination by the generosity of Disciples elsewhere. Ought not the church at large make the church at Hot Springs sufficient for this ministry?

Besides, what a glorious opportunity is furnished the Church of Christ at Hot Springs for the dissemination of its plea by the annual visit of a hundred thousand people from all parts of the world to that famous resort. In October a series of meetings will be held there by Evangelist Romig and singer. Let the brotherhood respond promptly to the call for $150 to supplement the work of the Hot Springs Church. I cheerfully bear witness to the godly character and indefatigable ministry of the pastor, Bro. T. N. Kincaid, and to the consecration and co-operation of such noble men as Dr. Connell and others in the Hot Springs Church. H. O. BREEDEN.

Knowledge of Food.

ROPER SELECTION OF GREAT IMPORTANCE IN SUMMER.

The feeding of infants in hot weather is a very erious proposition, as all mothers know. Food nust be used that will easily digest, or the undirested parts will be thrown into the intestines and ause sickness.

It is important to know that a food can be obained that is always safe; that is Grape-Nuts.

A mother writes: "My baby took the first premium at a baby show on the 8th inst., and is n every way a prize baby. I have fed him on Grape-Nuts since he was five months old. I also use your Postum Food Coffee for myself." Mrs. L. F. Fishback, Alvin, Tex.

Grape-Nuts food is not made solely for a baby food by any means, but is manufactured for all human beings who have trifling, or serious, difficulties in stomach and bowels.

One especial point of value is that the food is predigested in the process of manufacture, not by any drugs or chemicals whatsoever, but simply by the action of heat, moisture, and time which permits the diastase to grow, and change the starch into grape sugar. This presents food to the system ready for immediate assimilation.

Its especial value as a food, beyond the fact that it is easily digested, is that it supplies the needed elements to quickly rebuild the cells in the brain and nerve centers throughout the body.

Church Extension.

Jesus said: "Lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven." The only way to do this is to do a paying husiness on earth in the Master's cause.

From a financial view-point there is no investment a person can make equal in profit to that of giving to the Church Extension Fund. It pays in dollars a larger percentage than any other legitimate business on earth. All who are interested in mathematical calculations, I ask them to thoroughly study the underlying principle of the Church Extension plan of work and development, and then carefully compute the actual increase of church property which comes as the direct result of investing, say $2,500, in this fund for a period of from five to thirty years.

The result of this calculation will be the greateat surprise of your life.

It will run from 132 to over 3,000 per cent, of profit, a treasure laid up in heaven for you by being deposited on earth in the Church Extension Fund, which never ceases to work and is never exhausted, but grows with each succeeding year.

Figure it out for yourself. You may not discover the secret of it at first, yet it is there. It is the basis on which colossal fortunes are made by business men during their lifetime. I can prove my assertion to be correct if need be. Of all funds for financial and heavenly profit, the Church Extension Fund excels all others without any exception. R. H. BATEMAN.

Hearken to the Orphan's Cry.

None of the people in famine stricken India are in greater need of help than are the little children. The British Government is striving to feed the people. Tens of thousands of them are crowded together in its relief camps. Thousands of there will die from exposure and disease. Many will leave little children to be cared for. Most of the appeals that have come to the Christian Woman's Board of Missions from its missionaries have been for help to provide accommodations for caring for some of these children. The board is doing what it can to comply with these requests. A new dormitory is being built at Bilaspur and the old one enlarged. A second story is to be added to the new orphanage being built at Deoghur. Probably extensive enlargements will be made to the orphanage building at Mahoba.

The policy of the C. W. B. M. has always been to assign the children in its orphanages to individuals and organizations for support. It costs $30 per year to provide for the necessities for each child. This provides for its care as well as for food, clothing, books, medicines, etc. Support can be pledged for one year, a term of years, or best of all until the child becomes self-supporting. There is no better work to do than to provide for one of these helpless children. It will have the approval of the Master. A number of children have been lately received at Bilaspur and Mahoba Dr. Baldwin writes that she had made arrangements to take in seventy-five more girls the first of July. She has no funds with which to provide for their necessities. Many individuals who have been made stewards of our Lord's bounty would be doing his will and blessing their own lives by each supporting one of these children. Endeavor Societies, King's Daughters, Sunday-schools and Sunday school classes and other organizations should feel that the cry of these needy ones is a direct appeal to them for help; and they should heed and answer it.

As I have been given charge of this work I shall be happy to correspond concerning it with any and all who are willing to assist it. Please let me hear from you at once.

Pastorless Churches.

In Kansas we have over 400 churches. Our state superintendent, S. W. Lowe, tells me that only 190 of them have regular preaching, leaving over 200 churches in this state without preaching any part of the time, which means in nearly all cases they are practically dead. Allowing a 50-foot lot for each church standing side by side they would reach two miles. The question with the world as well as ourselves is, Shall these houses be left to stand idle and rot down, or shall we use them to preach the gospel of the Son of God in? The answer is largely in the work of our pastors. Our state superintendent could only visit onefourth of these places in a year if he only spent one week at each place. He must have the help of our pastors to put these churches to work.

I recently held a two weeks' meeting (filling my regular Lord's day appointment elsewhere) with one of these churches that had been idle for several years. We reorganized, elected new officers, and now I understand they have a good man hired half time until January.

I visited another church a few months since that had been without preaching for eighteen months. although we had the best house in town, all paid for and in excellent repair. I staid there four days including Lord's day and have been preaching there once a month ever since. Almost any three of these churches together could raise $600 a year. A good Ladies' Aid in each could raise half the amount and on that plan we could put 60 or 70 more pastors to work in Kansas immediately and keep them here.

Many of the states are in a similar position, and in these places the world is looking for our practice a great deal harder than they are listening for our plea. If each pastor will go out during the week, which would cost him nothing, and hold one or two meetings with these courches nearly all of them could be put to work with regular preaching at least part of the time. Brother Pastor, try this and report results. Kansas City, Kansas.

The Lands of the Long Day-V.

OARS versus PEDALS.

As has already been explained, there is a good deal of traveling by water to be done by any one who journeys through that part of Norway which consists of an indiscriminate tangle of mountains and fjords. In the height of the summer season local steamers run with convenient frequency, but the season is not yet at its height and the steamers are running with inconvenient infrequency and irregularity. To come to the end of a road and find that there is no steamer leaving for three days would be annoying if one were in a hurry. To provide for this contingency the government maintains a system of rowboat stations, on the same plan as the posting stations on the roads, where boats with two, three or four parsmen may be obtained on short notice for journeys of any reasonable length. Many a long delay is saved by this convenient means, and it is withal an agreeable variation on the usual modes of travel.

I had climbed, late one afternoon, up a by-road which rose abruptly two thousand feet from the sea level, poised dizzily for an instant on the knifelike edge of the ridge, and then incontinently dropped to the sea level again at the little village of Utrik on the Nordfjord. It was one of those places from which there is no mode of egress except by boats or wings. There was no steamer; I had no wings. But, with the assistance of the local potentate whose office gives him the title of "Landhandler," I secured a boat and two hardy Norsemen to row it. They took me six or eight miles diagonally across the fjord to a place where I could again get a road for a couple of dozen miles to the end of a lake, where I could get a steam launch to the foot of the valley of Videdal, up which I could climb nearly four thousand feet (riding where I could and walking where I must) past roaring cataracts, besides lakes filled with miniature icebergs, and through tunneled snowdrifts to the isolated mountain inn of Grjotli. That is the record of a single day of cycling in Norway-not a monotonous sport, whatever else may be said of it.

There is a road which runs from Grjotli down another valley to another fjord, making three thousand feet of the descent in six miles. The guidebook characterizes this "sudden and tremendous plunge" as the chief glory of the road. Opinions may reasonably differ, perhaps, as to whether a sheer drop of three thousand feet ought to be enrolled among the virtues of a road or entered on the other side of the book. Personally, I would be inclined to consider this a drop too much. But this much must be said for it, that I never saw a road more superbly engineered in the Alps or elsewhere, or one which led with such impressive suddenness from a barren wilderness of rocks and snow to a fertile and flowery valley. The village at the bottom of this stairway, Marok on the Geiranger Fjord, I deliberately consider as having scenically the finest situation in Norway.

Speaking of flowers, it may be remarked that Norway is particularly rich in wild flowers, and especially in some of those which are our familiar favorites at home. The first place must be given to the violet, which grows profusely in both Norway and Sweden at all altitudes under the snow line and is in season in the latter half of June. A miniature pansy in purple and yellow, with all the markings of the cultivated paney, but no larger than a rather small wild violet, is found in abundance in many of the valleys. Bluebells are decidedly more plentiful here than in Scotland, so far as my observation extends; and the moors and high lying plateaus are richly garbed in heatherboth the white and the kind that runs from blue to red through all the shades of purple—as any part of the Highlands. I found one wild rose in Telemarken, growing in a sheltered nook on the south side of an enormous boulder, where a rocky basin held a handful of soil. There is a delicate white star-flower with a threadlike stem which flourishes among the heather in exposed situations that seem unsuited to its frail constitution. Lilacs are just now coming into bloom in great profusion. The most brilliant floral exhibition which I have seen in this land was on the bleak Dovre Fjeld, near enough to the timber line to be sheltered by the last clump of stunted birches-an acre of blue violets, so closely packed that the green could scarcely be seen through the blue, flanked by an equally dense acre of yellow buttercups.

That matter of describing the women's costumes keeps weighing on my mind as a dreaded duty. It must be done, of course—everybody does it—and the transition from flowers to women is perhaps as easy as any that I shall find. But oh for some book about Norway conveniently at hand, preferably one by a woman. I would plagiarize from it gratefully and unblushingly. In the absence of that resource the matter stands about this way.

After I had been in Norway about a week it began to be borne in upon my consciousness that there were two general styles of dress in vogue among the women; that one was the ordinary sort, of which the masculine eye notes only the general effect and not the component parts, and that the other was-different. I gradually acquired the impression, too, that outside of the towns a considerable proportion of the women wore the other sort. It had a curious and rather pleasing effect, so that I took to noticing when a woman had it on long before it occurred to me to observe what it was. One evening I tried to think it out, but could get no farther than the recollection that there was a good deal of red and some white in the upper part of the outfit, and here and there some variegated spots-probably embroidery. That was the evening when I postponed the task of describing the costume in the article I was then writing and said it would require some more observation.

One evening, not long after this, my supper was served by an extremely cross-eyed maid in the costume. I had to fix my attention on something so that I would not see her face, so I observed her gown. It was not such a complicated matter after all. The skirt calls for no special comment, being of a dark hue, plainly made without ruffies, tucks, pleats or other visible decoration, and being mostly covered by a white apron. The apron had a band of "insertion" near the bottom which, as I afterwards learned, was the rather coarse hand-made linen lace, for the manufacture of which the Hardanger district is famous. The main item of the bodice was a bright-red, sleeveless affair, the form of which was something like a man's full-dress vest and something like a zouave jacket. It was edged with a strip either of solid black or of black and red embroidery which ran over the shoulders and down to the belt, giving a suspender effect. The yoke and sleeves were white. The space between the suspenders in front was filled with a very complicated piece of beadwork which, I judge, is considered the chief crown and glory of the whole costume. For millinery to go with this garb, the choice is a black silk bandkerchief with big red roses in the corners, but stiff white headdresses of various shapes are also worn.

I had an idea at first that this old national costume was now chiefly worn for the delectation of tourists, who always delight in it. But that theory was soon exploded by seeing it in many places where tourists were not expected. Especially in thd districts of Telemarken and Hardanger, but more or less all over the land, it is the habitual and daily costume of a large proportion of the country women. The only variations which I observed were an occasional skirt of bright-red, trimmed in black, and rarely the substitution of a green bodice for the red one.

The chances are that the English-speaking traveler who visits Norway will enter the country without much knowledge of the Norse language. The chances are, too, that he will leave in the same condition, for there is no country in continental Europe where so large a per cent. of the population are acquainted with English. Neither Denmark nor Holland can compare with Norway in this respect. English is the second language of almost everybody who has a second language. In winter the guides from the mountains go over to work in the English coal mines and the waitresses and serving maids cross over and serve in English families for the sake of acquiring the language. The close commercial relations with England make it necessary for almost every one who is in trade to know English, and the tremendous influx of English tourists every summer furnishes an equally potent stimulus in the same direction.

Even the children pick up a few words of English to serve their need. One of their favorite devices is to obtain possession of English coppers by some means (legitimate and honorable, I hope), and with the cry of "change penny" induce the passer-by to change them for Norse money. As the rate of exchange which they propose is fully double that recognized by the banks, an infant with prepossessing manners and an ingratiating smile can pick up quite a tidy sum in the course of a day, especially if a fresh boatload of English tourists has just landed direct from Newcastle or Hull.

But I had much more boating to do before reaching the end of my cycling trip in Southern Norway. At Marok, the town of magnificent situation above mentioned. I arrived just after the semiweekly boat had departed. It was out of the question to climb back up that 3,000-foot hill, the descent of which I had enjoyed so much So a rowboat was again summoned and four good oars took me thirteen miles along the foot of the precipitous cliffs of the Geiranger Fjord to a place from which I could get a road to another place from which a steamer was due to leave next morning. On reaching the other place at the end of the road it was discovered that for some reason the steamer would not leave next morning. I was pocketed again. But a couple of oarsmen were soon found who agreed to take me thirty miles to the nearest point on the road leading to the town where I could get the steamer for the valley of Rousdal, which was my objective point.

We started early in the afternoon, I shall not attempt to put on paper the enthusiasm which I felt over the unusual beauty of that fjord, its curious dolomite peaks, its glistening glaciers and charming valleys. But headwinds across the fjord became rougher than I supposed a fjord could ever be. The little boat plunged about in the waves, and thirty miles seemed a long distance under the circumstances. My oarsmen quaffed goat's milk at intervals from a large tin bucket and had sandwiches in reserve, but I with a singular lack of prescience had brought no provisions. Later the wind became available for service and my hardy oarsmen rigged a mast, hoisted a mainsail and a jib on a boat with neither center-board nor keel of any consequence, tied the sheet, sat on the tiller and placidly ate their supper. This comes of having the blood of vikings in one's veins, I suppose. Being without that commodity, I admit that I felt a strong inclination to climb the windward rail, and even forgot (for a moment) that I was hungry. Delayed by foul weather, we reached port after midnight. The port turned out to be simply a little dock-no town, no hotel, no semblance or substitute for an inn. I wheeled for an hour in the bright link of twilight which binds the days together here in this northern summer. The unset glow in the north paled for a while and then began to redden ir to a premonition of sunris in the northeast. It became evident presently that I was not in a region of either towns or inns, so I pulled up under a tree, wrapped my waterproof cape about me and lay down to sleep in the open air and supperless within three degrees W. E. GARRISON. of the Arctic Circle.

THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR WORLD'S CONVENTION.

At Alexandra Park and Palace are being held, while I write this letter, some of the grandest meetings ever assembled in England. My soul has rejoiced in the magnificent demonstration of this week. The whole world has sent its representatives. I remember a spirited letter which a few years ago appeared in the CHRISTIAN-EVAN-GELIST from the pen of my gifted friend, J. J. Haley, which first convinced me of the worth and importance of "Christian Endeavor." He called it the the "vast uprising of the youth of Christendom." Their upheaval has astonished the world. The crystallized old fegies and the hardsanctified fossils of Calvinism and Arminianism alike have continued to stare over the heads of the rallying youths and maidens in all lands, or to affect to see Jerusalem coming down from heaven in some other direction. But this half-sullen affectation of lotus-eating lissez faire indifference to anything new simply resulted in this, that these same ancient survivals of rusty pietism are left on the cold, dusty, musty shelf of the ecclesiastical museum. There are good people in all our churches who still do not notice that there is such a movement as this Christian Endeavor Society. They cannot be accused of looking down on it, for they stand gazing up into heaven all the time in sublimated, though not sublime, superciliousness. But they will now understand that this institution has arrived to remain. . I will not say "come to stay." I vary the phrase so as not to shock those who want it to move forward into perspective and fade out of vision. I have had considerable difficulty to secure from some very good people any recognition of the mere existence of Christian Endeavor.

DE. FRANCIS E. CLARK'S ESCAPE FROM CHINA.

A merciful incident is the arrival of Dr. Clark, the famous founder of the movement. He narrowly missed a cruel fate. Had he and Mrs. Clark remained a few days longer in Pekin they would have been victims in that awful tragedy at the Legations. They traveled through Siberia and were hindered some days by the movements of Russian troops making for China. The two men who are dual cynosure of all eyes at the Alexandra Palace Convention are Dr. Clark and C. M. Sheldon, of Topeka, Kan. Clark is a fine orator. Sheldon is a simple talker, who would never be noticed in any series of meetings. Clark fills his speeches with fresh points and illustrates them with charming references to his much-traveled experience. Sheldon does not seem to be in touch even with his own favorite subjects. Clark is both a founder and a builder of an actual edifice. Sheldon has set nothing up but a floating mirage. Clark is all for practice. Sheldon is all for theory. Clark acts. Sheldon dreams. Here we have two men, one of whom is the antithesis of each in all respects. But there is an equal fascination in each. I believe they are equally great and good. I believe in Clark, who performs wonders. I believe in Sheldon, who projects greater wonders still. We all need the Apostle and the Seer also. We owe America an unspeakable debt for sending forth to the whole world two such men. Their mission is cosmopolitan. Sheldon and Clark belong to the whole race. I have a conviction that these two men are even more popular in Britain than in America. I have noticed that a great American is thought more of in England than in his own land, and that a great Britisher is thought more of in America than even here. For example, Henry Varley draws larger audiences in the United States than in England, popular though he is with us. Talmage draws bigger crowds on this side of the water than on his own native ground. Du Maurier, author of that silly book, "Trilby," attained his greatest fame as a wonderful artistlitterateur-for such he was-by the enormous reputation which his works gained in America. Mrs. Beecher Stowe was thought much of in America, but it was England which made the world ring with her name. I like all this. It proves the comity of Christian nations. It shows the solidarity of Anglo-Saxondom. It gives evidence that the two peoples reciprocate sympathy, that they are quick to appreciate each other's merits and that they delight mutually in the possession of men and women of real genius and true goodness.

CHRIST THE COSMOPOLITAN.

That greatest of thinkers amongst English preachers of the past generation, F. W. Robertson, of Brighton, says in one of his sermons: "Jesus Christ is of no nationality." Of course, that really means that the Redeemer is of all nationalities. The cosmopolitan power of the gospel is aplendidly in evidence at the Alexandra Palace Convention. Natives of India and Japan, of all the British colonies, and of all countries in Europe, are receiving an ovation, while missionaries from many heathen lands are being listened to with rapt attention. This adaptation of Christian Endeavor to all the race shows that it really is a Christian movement. One of the most interesting men present is Mr. Hadara, a native of Japan. Dr. Clark has come straight from a Christian Endeavor Convention in China. A great Frenchman, Dr. Theodor Monod, is taking part. Many Australians are with us, and as for Americans, who can find out the number of the legion from Columbia?

SOME AMERICANS HERE.

I am daily hoping to see Prof. Haggard. He has arrived in London. Last Sunday morning I and my people had the great privilege of hearing a sermon from James T. Nicholls, of Vinton, Ia., who is a delegate to the C. E. Convention and has taken up his quarters for a few days among my people before going to Paris. I hear of other American brethren, whom I shall hope to see. All receive a very cordial welcome in this country, which I trust they appreciate.

THE ONLY BLOT ON CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR.

There are spots on the sun, and this kind of solar spotty eruption is apt to be used rather shabbily by the apologists for spoticularity in any good thing. But the sun can very well afford to be considerably spotted. His over radiance hides his flecks from ordinary perception, and when he is half-blinding us it is a positive relief to know that he is even in a slight degree smallpoxed with patches on his blazing complexion. But I have noticed that some apologists for the most unnecessary and inexcusable evils always fall back on the flecks on the solar disc, which seem to be the only astronomical objects they ever heard of, so constant is the reference they make to these dark solutions of continuity in the sun's light. Now, I am greatly disappointed to find that one of the most enthusiastic features of the Christian Endeaver World's Convention is the very one which should never have been permitted and which should be improved out of existence if Christian Endeavor is to fulfill its highest possible aim. It has always seemed to me, as a Disciple of Christ, that we Disciples in America and England should do all in our power to promote the success of the Endeavor campaign everywhere, because this movement promised in some great degree to solve the problem of Christian unity. It for a time seemed to be magnificently free from sectarian spirit. But perhaps the most stirring meetings at Alexandra Park and Palace this week are the denominational rallies of all sorts of sects and parties, little and big. The Congregationalists and Baptists especially have held enormous rallies. I have attended these with very mixed feelings, admiring the zeal displayed, but regretting that it was wasted on the only objectionable and unscriptural items in the grand program. It is of course intensely stimulating to a great Baptist assembly to hear first Dr. Clifford, of London, and then Dr. Lorimer, of Boston, glorifying the Baptists. Then, when in the grand Congregational rally several eminent Congregationalist orators spend two hours in lauding to the heavens the supreme merits of Congregationalist polity, it may be expected that a perfect rapture takes possession of the gathering of at least 3,000 zealots. But it is positively distressing to see how Christian Endeavor is thus being taken advantage of to defeat the very first aim which should be kept in view by modern Christian workers. This glorious institution is being jammed into the ruts and grooves of the most determined sectism. I fear that nothing can be effectually done to prevent this tendency. But I am very thankful to say that one rally was missing. Disciples of Christ are having no such meeting, though large numbers are present at the Palace. And now, after thus writing to set forth my impressions, I go to Alexandra Palace for the last day of the convention. In my next letter I purpose to say what we think and feel here in England about the international tragedy in China. WILLIAM DURBAN.

VISITING FRIENDS IN KNOXVILLE.

"I had been greatly troubled by being kept awake at night whenever I drank coffee. It also disagreed with my digestion. Last summer I was visiting a friend in Knoxville, who had been suffering from rheumatism, caused by coffee drinking. She had quit using coffee and was using Postum and had recovered; also her delicate daughter who had been an invalid for a long time, was greatly benefited by the use of Postum Food Coffee.

"I found while I was there and using Postum regularly that I slept much better and grew so strong in my nerves that the change was wonderfui. I trust my testimonial will be the means of inducing others to try your magnificent beverage. These are true and honest facts." Miss Frances Smith, 632 Douglas St., Chattanooga, Tenn.

The reason Miss Smith and her friends improved in health, is that coffee acts as a poison on many delicate organisms. When it is left off, the cause of the trouble is removed, then if Postum Food Coffee is taken, there is a direct and quick rebuilding of the nerve centers all through the body, for Postum Food Coffee contains the elements needed by the system to rebuild the nerve centers.

Made at the pure food factories of the Postum Cercal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich., and sold by all first-class grocers.

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

There is an impression abroad, and I more than half believe that you entertain it, that New England is not a fruitful field for the Disciples of Christ. I wish that I could smite that notion with such power that it would never again be seen or heard. The fact is, New England is a most promising field, when properly cultivated, for those who stand for the New Testament Christianity. If you will but think of the character of our efforts in this field, the present vissible results are certainly encouraging. They have lacked steadiness and persistence. This remark does not mean that New England Disciples are not steady and per sistent. In these quarters they excel. The remark is made with especial reference to our missionary organizations and preachers. The preacher's home-the home of the Disciple preacher, I mean-is in the West, and he cannot be persuaded to reside in the East. He is here as a sojourner. This is the rule. The General Convention has not regarded, does not now consider the East in a favorable light. No one acquainted with the facts will call in question the correctness of this statement. The remark that our efforts in New England lack steadiness and persistence is to be read in the light of these qualifying statements. Nothing on a large scale has ever been attempted by the Disciples in this part of the world. Our plans have been small and our expectations ditto. Is there any occasion for surprise at results? Let the surprise rather be that results have been under the circumstances so fruitful. E. Jay Teagarden's work in Danbury shows what can be done in New England. The congregation in Worcester, at 829 Main Street, has made great progress since my last visit. Swampscott has a good house and is ready for the right man. The clouds that have hung over the work in that seaside town are disappearing and the sun is beginning to shine. An encouraging beginning has been made in Springfield, and also in Everett. These are to us new places. The Beston work is in better condition than ever before. J. H. Mohorter is the right man for that place. He ought to spend his life in Boston. Harry Minnick did a work in Lubec, Me., that he will probably never excel in any other dozen years, if he should live to be an old man. The Disciples in New England, without exception, so far as I have heard an expression on the subject, regret his departure from that field. They will be glad with a great joy when he shall decide to return to New England. Haverhill has a small house and a new preacher in the person of Brc. Fred Nichols. He is full of hope, courage and enthusiasm. The outlook is cheering. The little church in Manton, R. I., is not dead. Manton is practically in the city of Providence. Prof. A. S. Heaney, who was for many years connected with Packard's Business College in New York City, has opened a commercial college in Providence. He is a staunch and active Disciple of Christ. His influence is already felt. There is a good chapel in Manton, free from debt. There are prosperous congregations of Disciples in West Paulet and West Rupert in the state of Vermont. There are at least nine societies in New England auxiliary to the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. There is, in fact, light all around the horizon in New England.

The people are intelligent. They are not satisfied with what they have. They are asking, Is there not something better? The churches in too many cases are rich, cultured, cold. There is, however, in New England, in all the churches, a genuinely religious element. The plea of the Disciples pleases such men and women. Whoever attempts to represent the D.s iples of Ch ist in New England ought to set fort" the movement as a plea for a deeper and more intelligent spiritual life. This is "our plea" in a sentence. It is not a doctrinal so much as it is a practical Christian union movement-a union movement looking to the speedy evangelization of the world. It is a union in Christ for the purpose for which he founded his church. Put in this way it meets a present and growing condition in New England.

The people ask questions. One of our preachers addressed a Y. M. C. A. meeting. He proposed to discuss any practical topic or consider any question that might be presented. The following were sent in: "Is the whole Bible inspired?" "Is Spiritualism true?" "Do you believe that infant baptism is wrong?" "Is it right for one who has been christened to be immersed after he has grown up?" In another city the following was placed in the hands of the preacher:

"If immersion only is baptism, has any one the right to administer sprinkling as baptism in the name of Jesus? Can those so baptized truly claim the promises of forgiveness of sins and the gift of the Holy Spirit? If so, why do you require them to be immersed to unite with your denomination, seeing their former baptism is honored? If not, how do you account for the lives, the work and the blessings received by those so baptized?"

These are but samples—taken, if you please, at random-of questions and statements of difficulties which one encounters who enters New England as an advocate of simple New Testament Christianity. The thoughtfulness, the independence and the moral courage of the people are apparent all the time. Think of a Y. M. C. A. meeting requesting such a discussion as that mentioned above! Did you ever encounter anything of the kind? But this aptly and concretely illustrates a prominent New England characteristic. The typical Yankee dares to ask questions about anything; dares to invite a discussion of any topic. This makes this field at once congenial and hopeful.

The typical New England man, of whom I speak, knows nothing of the out-West style of debating, so much in vogue a few years ago. He is an inquirer rather than a controversialist. The Yankee wants to know. His desire is to learn. Your religious (?) polemic, it is true, does not seriously object to learning if there were only something of which he is ignorant! But the theological pugilist has completed the curriculum. His education is finished. The evangelism for which multitudes are ready in New England is a kind of inquiry meetings-meetings in which questions are asked and answered. The down-East man wants to know your know, and this peculiarity makes him an intensely interesting personality to the preacher who is not dead at the top.

There is a warmth, a cordiality, a heartiness on the part of the people that you, never having visited this part of the world, do not think exists. You think of the New England people as cool, calculating, unemotional, intellectual, do you not? There is no place on the North American continent where the preacher of the "ancient gospel" receives a more cordial handshake or h ars words of heartier appreciation than in this field. There is genuine hospitality, too. Neither Kentucky, Virginia nor Missouri can excel Massachusetts in this matter.

One of our preachers was leaving a New England city after a sojourn of days. As he was entering the railway car a small pasteboard box was placed in his hands, on which were the words: "Comfort Powders." Opening the box with a curiosity which cannot be expressed, he found written on neatly folded bits of paper the following:

"There shall no evil befall thee."

"The Lord bless thee and keep thee and cause his face to shine on thee."

"Thou shalt rejoice the Lord thy God in all thou puttest thine hands unto" (Deut. 12:18).

"The Lord will hold thy right hand saying, Fear not; I will help thee" (Isa. 12:13).

Verily, these quotations are "Confort Powd rs." Three months have now been spent in New England. They have been months of pure joy. Everybody seemed to have entered into a c napiracy to cause us to have a good time. The conspiracy was a pronounced success! How glad we will be to visit New England again. The benediction of the Most High be on and abide with the Disciples of Christ in New England.

Among the Canadians.

Since coming to Ontario I have visited seven churches and preached in all 38 sermons. At Mosa and Hillier I conducted their annual, or "June meetings," as they are called. These annual meetings are the events of the season in many of the churches in the Dominion. Many brethren came from a considerable distance to attend them. I am at this writing at Hillier, Prince Edward County, a county virtually surrounded by water. near the eastern end of Lake Ontario. There are only two churches in this county and are ministered to by J. D. Stephens a wise and consecrated minister of the Word, who attended Bethany College when A. McLean was its president.

The people of the Domision, as a class, are much more conservative than the people of the states. They hold on to old customs with a much firmer grip, and on this account it is more difficult to make converts among them than among the American people. As a result, they want more time to think and act than do the people across the line. They take more time to everything than the Western people. Many of them are very loyal to the mother country and do not take readily to some people and things that come from the "other side."

Religion, with Cenadians in general, is a much more serious affair than with many Americans. One will not be long across the line without noticing this difference. It is exceedingly difficult to get them to laugh or even smile during a religious service, no matter how laughable an anecdote a preacher may chance to tell. In a Scotch settlement, where I preached a week since coming into the province, I decided one day to try what effect a few rather amusing anecdotes would have upon my audience. I had often used the same ones on American audiences and invariably found them to have the desired effect. But in this case my experiment seemed to be a failure. The audience were as grave as though they were attending a funeral. Next day, however, on visiting one of the families who had attended my meeting the previous day, I found them laughing most heartily at one of the amusing anecdotes I had told. This seriousness is carried into everything that is in any way connected with religion or church work -even into their Sunday-school picnics. And while it may be carried to an extreme, so that people, and especially the young, may be led to look upon religion as something to make people longfaced and gloomy, still it is in many respects praiseworthy. The writer has long thought that one of the things most lacking in American church life is reverence for sacred things. Our very ideas of "freedom," as a nation. I fear, have prevented our cultivating the grace of reverence.

Our cause is not making as rapid headway in the Dominion as it should. It had about as early a start here as in the states. The people are a Bible people. They believe the Bible, love it and study it as no other people, and what they most desire upon the part of a preacher is Bible preaching. The people will listen with deep interest for more than an hour at a time to a preacher explaining the Scriptures to them, and then tell him they could have listened longer. Owing to these facts, therefore, I do not think there is any more fruitful field for the preaching of primitive Christianity than the Dominion of Canada. The trouble in the past is that they have not been able to put strong men in the field to do the work of evangelists. What is now needed in Canada are some bold, strong Bible evangelists, supported in such a way that they can go into the large towns and cities, and stay by the work long enough to compel a hearing. I say bold men, because neither timid men nor half-hearted work will make the desired impression upon the people here, any more than it did in our own land at the beginning of the Reformation. Canada is ripe for the gospel sickle if only it can be used by strong, judicious respers.

H. T. MORRISON.

Hillier, June 28.

What will the Christian Citizen do Now?

For many years our Christian brethren have been saying to us: "If I had the power I would swipe the whole whisky business from the earth." Bulet me ask you, in Christ's name, what will you do with the power you already have?) Do not forget the words of our Lord, that "he who is faithful over a few things I will make him lord over many,'; and those other words against him who was not faithful over the little things: "Who," he asks, "will entrust to him the true riches?"

Those little spasms of artificial indignation, when we say what sweet things we would do if we had the power, only show how shallow a hold the matter has upon us and what a great power it is that lies behind and prompts such empty words; that is, moral sloth. (We are facing a national election in which the saloon issue confronts us in a different form from what it ever did before.

For many years the question was one of drunkenness against moderate drinking, and then it came to be a question of drinking against total abstinence, and there thousands came to personal perfection and stopped and refused to recognize the newer and mightier question, which was: "Shall our laws license and perpetuate it or prohibit its sale for drinking purposes?" Along that line we . have pleaded for many years, but now it has changed front and we must meet it in a still higher form.

The question now is: "Shall the liquor power annul the laws of Congress?" Shall it overawe the PresIdent and break down the former restraints in our territories and flood our new possessions? That our laws and courts are being more and more overridden by it is too manifest for any man of sense and conscience to deny.

The Supreme Court of the United States and the Christian assemblies have confined themselves hitherto to pointing out the crime and sin and poverty of the drink question, but now a great national party has declared how the aggressions of the liquor power has gone forward til it has, with the consent of the government at Washington, annulled the act of Congress, broken down the laws in the states and territories, established a system of saloons in the army that trains every soldier to be a saloonkeeper by turn and has opened the floodgates to debauch the inhabitants of our possessions.

(The question has left its old ground and is no longer a question of drink or of selling drink, but a question of life or of death to government) The Prohibition party which met at Chicago, June 28, recognizes this change of situation and stands up to meet it by directing all its forces at this one point. No matter what one's opinions are about drinking or the license system, one thing is now certain; that is, the license system capitalized the business till it now coerces part of the press and the pulpit into silence or co-operation.

Many men of conscience have been saving to us for years: "If you will give us the single issue we will vote against the liquor power." Well, we have now done that. We present the single issue shall we have civil government or whisky, nullification or rebellion? and will vote on that question at the polls in November. We present no other question. How will you vote? If you have been untrue and insincere in years past you will again fix up your excuse for following after parties who devise such issues only as they hope to be able to get into office; and if you are willing to be worked you can find a new excuse, thinner than those hitherto, and so go on building on "wood, hay and stubble," till the inevitable revolution will burn down your house and we shall see your scramble to cover the shame of your record.

There is no question of currency, of monopoly or of imperialism or of labor that can be compared to this, which combines them all in one a hundredfold greater and adds the blackest crime of the age.

This I must say: that to me it is a question of Christ and the flag on one hand and of treason and denial upon the other.

What answer shall we give to God for our conduct at the November election? Let us look the facts full in the face. J. S. Hughes.

The Summer Quarter in the Disciples' Divinity House.

It is well known that one of the most interesting educational experiments of modern times is that of the summer quarter inaugurated so successfully a few years since at the University of Chicago. This is not a summer school, but a regular quarter of the university, differing in no regard from the other three, save perhaps in the more ample provision made for brief residence on the part of that large class of students who form for the most part the personnel of the university during the summer season. These include ministers, professors from other institutions, students who are anxious to make up work which will permit them to take higher standing in the schools from which they come, and representatives from other classes too numerous to mention. The opportunities afforded by an ordinary vacation have been greatly amplified by the university plan of the summer quarter. These advantages have been quickly realized, and the attendance has steadily grown since the foundation of the university until this summer it far exreeds any record made heretofore. The number of students and theological students in attendance is unusually large. This is in part accounted for by the presence of special instructors from other institutions, including Prof. McGiffert, of Union Theological Seminary, and Prof. Riggs, of Auburn, together with the regular and special lecturers of the resident faculty.

In no department of the institution is the growth of attendance more marked than in the Disciples' Divinity House. The number of those in attendance has steadily increased from the first year, always of course much larger in the summer than the other seasons, owing to the vacation privileges. This year there are thirtyeight men in the House, nearly all of them graduates of our colleges and representing the following schools:

From Bethany: C. G. Brelos, of Joliet, Ill., and W. C. Chapman, Higgingville, Mo. From Drake University: Claire Waite, Cedar Rapids, Ia.; F. F. Grimm, Chicago; C. C. Morrison, Chicago; Horace Siberell, Pickering, Mo., and E. O. Sharpe, Girard, Ill. From Eureka: J. P. Mc-Night, Oskaloosa, Ia.; G. A. Miller, Covington, Ky., and T. R. Hoteling, Kentland, Ind. From Butler: A. H. Ward, Rensellaer, Ind. From Kentucky University: E. T. Edmunds, Fort Smith, Ark; G. B. Vanarsdall, Peoria, Ill.; W. E. Ellis, Nashville, Tenn.; E. S. In addition there are several men from other than our own schools, such as P. F. King, Austin, Tex., of Bethel College, Kentucky; C. M. Sharp, Lawrence, Kan., from the University of Kansas, and Grant Pike, Hebron, Ind., of Mt. Union College. Several of our schools are represented by members of their faculties, now resident in the university: Prof. G. A. Peckham, of Hiram; Profs. R. E. Conklin and O. B. Clark, of Eureka: Prof. Bondurant, of Bethany: Profs. W. H. Matlock and D. W. Moorehouse, of Drake; Prof. F. H. Marshall, of Add-Ran, and Profs. Abbott and Homer Wilson, of Butler. Prof. E. S. Ames, of Butler, is giving instruction in the Department of Philosophy.

In addition to the regular work of the Divinity School which they take, a class is conducted by Mr. Gates on the History of the Disciples, in accordance with the plan of the Divinity House to provide special instruction in themes relating to the history, literature and purposes of our own people. An assembly of the Disciples is held weekly at which lectures are delivered by the dean, and conferences concerning the work of the Disciples are conducted. During the past week a reception was hold at Haskell Oriental Museum, at which the attendance was the largest in the history of our work here, and addresses were made by the president of the university, representatives of the different colleges, the dean and others. The membership of the House supplies preaching to a large number of churches in and near Chicago, and even other religious bodies receive supplies from our members. The co-operation between the Divinity House and the Hyde Park Church of Christ is a cause of strength to both, and the new church building is proving itself a valuable accessory to our work at the university. The Divinity House is steadily growing in its power for good and in its influence, attracting as it does some of the best men from all our institutloas, utilizing them while here in city mission and other Christian work, and thus helping them, not only to preserve and deepen the impress of our own cause, but to secure the means by which their further work at the university may be H. The Wellsville minister, H. J. Corwine, authorized me to report his church as having accepted their apportionment in full.

Sturgeon school, under the wise leadership of J. W. Hulett, increased their giving one-third. Bro. Richmond, their pastor, was given the month of July without any reduction of salary that he might spend it at the bedside of his wife, whose mental aberration brought such a shadow over their happy home. The sympathies of our brotherhood are with this good man and his sad-Laddonia has some classes of young people whose attendance is worthy of your imitation, the classes having an attendance record of 93 per cent. The rally gave new life to every division of the school, while J. C. De Laporte sends in onehalf of the school's apportionment for this year.

Brethren, please look over your magazine and minute files and if you have any copies of the minutes of our Bible school conventions prior to 1895, please send them to us, as we need them badly.

J. B. Dunkerly superintends the Beulah (St. Louis) Bible-school, and it was my pleasure to be with them one Lord's day while W. A. Moore was taking his vacation. The brethren have combined the school and church services, hoping thereby to increase the attendance of the church membership in the Bible-school as well as the Bible-school pupils' attendance in the church service, and when the cooler weather sets in they will attempt it right, too. Warm weather is harder on city schools than rough weather is on the country schools, but J. B. Dunkerly, R. M. Denholm, W D. Cree and Singer Handley seek to overcome all these hindrances in their prosecution of this good work, and they will succeed. No school does better considering its financial burdens for our work than does Beulah, and if all would do as well we would have means to spare.

The Grand River district held its convention at Jamesport, and it was one of the best ever held in the district-right in Jamesport, too. Luther Collier, that devoted business man, and J. W. Alexander, full of secular work, and others like them gave time and money to this district. Jamesport has one of the successful Bible-schools under the oversight of C. M. Sliffee, while W. E. Bates, their minister, is advancing the Church of Christ.

No kinder reception could have been given one than F. V. Loos extended me in my mission among the Missouri schools. After a ride of forty miles overland and preaching two funerals he changed teams and took me to Olivet, where in the home of my frend, John Williams, we had hearty Five years ago this school was organwelcome. ized and Will Boggess, efficient and pure, was made superintendent, and on his call to the higher work, for which he now prepares at Lexington, John Williams was induced to accept the superintendency, and his management of the school, his remarkable work in the review, demonstrated his fitness and efficiency in this high calling. The immense audience at 11 o'clock and the ready response to Bro. Loos' motion toward helping our work demonstrate his peculiar influence with the people. Besides, the pastor's salary was paid in full.

The story of another year's work will soon be finished. Only a few short, hot weeks in which to redeem the time. Happy is the auxiliary that has kept up to the mark and has done all things in order and on time. What a contrast to the one that must rush about to collect back dues and try to make up pledges—we say try, because it is often impossible to meet obligations when the last minute for doing so has been reached.

We trust every auxiliary will act upon the secretary's suggestion of some months ago, to hold its last meeting during the first week in September so all reports may reach St. Louis by Sept. 10th, as the books close that day. All coming later will fail to reach the state meeting at Moberly. The national secretary also requests full state reports early in September, which is an additional reason for promptness. Every woman on our rolls and every dollar raised should be reported to your state secretary, as our rank among the other states is determined by the number of women and dollars we report. The same is true of the Junior department. Would it not be a glorious source of strength to our dear sisters if every auxiliary in the state would hold its next meeting on Wednesday, Sept. 5th, thus making that day Missouri Day, and have a special season of thanksgiving of the past year, and of specific prayer for China and her people, and for the missionaries of the cross within her borders that God will hold them safely in his hand? He will surely hear our united petitions and answer in his own best way and bless us for the asking. This will give auxiliary officers several days in which to hunt up delinquents in payment before the 10th. Please do this, my sisters.

We hear much about loyalty to Christ, to country, to church, etc., but many of our auxiliaries forget loyalty to state and send no offering to develop the work in Missouri. How can we hope to prosper if we look not at home as well as abroad. Only $23 in state treasury and many the time.

There are still $8,000 needed to complete the endowment of the Virginia Bible Chair Lectureship. It is our hope to lay this work complete before the Lord in Kansas City in October. But $8,000 is a large sum to raise and will take large effort, but if all help as much as they possibly can, 'twill be done. SHALL IT?

Is there not some one in Missouri who can give the whole amount or a fair portion of it, thus bringing honor to the state and God's blessing to himself? Use your money while you live, my friends, and get an earthly as well as a heavenly blessing in seeing the good done to humanity.

We certainly have received much; let us give much. Yours in His name, MRS. L. G. BANTZ.

Northwestern Ohio.

Favette, at which place I shall be located for he scholastic year of 1900-'1 and probably permanently, is a quiet, beautiful village of about 1,200 inhabitants, situated in a rich, thrifty agricultural region. It is the terminus of a pranch of the Lakeshore Railroad, and is about wo and a half miles from the Michigan line. s an ideal college town, free from saloons and the dens of vice usually found in larger towns and cities. The people have been in thorough sympathy with the educational enterprises which have been located here since 1881, and stand by the present organization with money and hearty co-operation. I know of no place where students are given a heartier welcome, or where parents having children to educate can do so with greater safety or satisfaction.

Fayette is in Fulton County, which has had for many years the presence and labors of great and good men interested in the presentation and conquests of the powerful plea for the restoration of primitive Christianity. I have become acquainted practically with two congregations in this region, the one at Fayette and another at Alvordton, Williams County, both of which I have been permitted to address and both of which are thoroughy committed to the defense of the gospel.

The Fayette congregation has a neat, commolious structure, on the roof of which, in colored elate, is the significant name, Church of Christ, o clear and large that it can be read at the disance of several hundred yards. On the roof of he oldest congregation's house is the equally ignificant name, M. E. CHURCH. The church has ecured for its pastor next year Brother Cook, ust graduated from the Bible Department at rvington, Ind. He is a son of Dr. S. M. Cook, of Wood County, and will have entered upon his luties by the time this letter reaches the public.

In looking through the history of Henry and Fulton Counties the other day I found this statenent concerning the congregation at Wauseon. After stating that the church was organized in 1862, but that it was not provided with a house of worship until 1864, the writer says: "This church has been an influential body of worshiping Christians since its organization. Its first pastor was Rev. Elberry Smith. H: was succeeded by Rev. L. L Carpenter, who was an active, enterorising citizen of Fulton County for many years, as well as an earnest and able clergyman. He was treasurer of the county two terms, and his nonesty and ability in that office have passed into a local proverb."

I know Bro. Carpenter will forgive me for ecording this tribute to his worth by disinterested parties. It is usual to reserve the saying of pleasant things of people until they have shuffled off this mortal coil, but I believe it is neither wise nor just to reserve all eulogies for the funeral sermon or the tombstone. Bro. Carpenter is widely and favorably known in Fulton County; in fact, throughout Northwestern Ohio. He would prefer, I am sure, to have the title "Rev." omitted from his name, though if any mortal is deserving of that designation he is. He is, I know, so loyal to the Lord in heaven that he will agree with the psalmist that 'Holy and Reverend is his name." He will allow this much-abused title to be applied to him to whom it properly belongs—the Lord. belongs-the Lord.

I hope to visit a number of the congregations in this region as time and opportunity will permit and shall report further progress.

Give Us Men!

Give us men!

Men from every rank,
Fresh and free and frank;
Men of thought and reading,
Men of light and leading,
Men of loyal breeding,
Men of faith and not of faction,
Men of lofty aim in action;
Give us men—I say again,
Give us men!

Give us men!
Strong and stalwart ones;
Men whom bighest hope inspires,
Men whom purest honor fires,
Men who trample self beneath them,
Men who make their country wreathe them
As her notle sons,
Worthy of their sires!
Men who never shame their mothers,
Men who never fail their brothers,

True, however false are others; Give us men—I say again. Give us men!

Give us men!

Men who, when the tempest gathers,
Grasp the standards of their fathers
In the thickest of the fight;
Men who strike for home and altar
(Let the coward cringe and falter),
God defend the right!
True as truth, though lorn and lonely,
Tender—as the brave are only;
Men who tread where saints have trod,
Men for country and for God;
Give us men! I say again, again,
Give us such men!

The Sacredness of Marriage.

BY C. R. PAINE.

As there is a little talk these days among our Episcopalian brethren and some others concerning the divorce and remarriage question, may I be pardoned for saying a few words on this very important subject?

Amidst the pile of trash that Catholicism has, it has some good things on this subject and I believe more commendable than anything Protestantism has on hand, because in her divided state she has not been able to do anything very practical.

Christianity is life, and the divorce business does violence to every principle of life, and to the best interests of the family from any view-point. The lesson of the beginning of marriage as taught by Christ and Paul is in perfect harmony with the above thought, and we must recognize it sooner or later. This fact of life can only be annulled at the death of one or the other. Each is under law to the other as long as they both shall live. There can be no contingencies of any character to break it; no more than the annulling of any other living relationship without death to one of the parties. There is a principle of life underlying every marriage which must not be disregarded.

It has no legal aspects about it. It is not a legal affair simply for convenience for a term of years. This phase must be abandoned before there can be any proper adjustment of this question. In all legal contracts terms of agreement and disagreement are stated and dissolution can only take place in harmony with them. In marriage there are no terms of dissolution discussed or arranged; how, then, can the covenant be dissolved. It is a perpetual contract—in other words, a living corelation. I am not speaking of the irreligious. They can do as they please. They are not in that close relation to God as Christians are. What we need is righteousness on the part of God's Israel—examples to the ungodly. We must act wholly independent, and better results will follow. This idea that we must be tied to the world's ways is a thing of Constantine and Catholicism, and should be dropped.

There are two evils, closely related, that play sad havoc in the wedded life—the cost of living and the decrease of children. There is nothing pleasant about this subject, so do not be shocked at some plain language. It is a subject that cannot be handled lightly.

On the questions above stated I wish to quote a few words from the pen of Dr. Philip Schaff: "It is a sad fact that the breaches, such as adultery and desertion, are on the who'e increasing, and that separations have still more increased within the present century. If the expense of maintaining families should increase as it has done and the style of living go along with it and at equ I pace, and the apparent desire of many not to have large families should become still more manifest, then we may expect that decay of family life to show itself, which involves alike the decay of religion and state."

God has given a law to protect society, but present indications point to an ignorance or willful violence. I dislike to charge Christian people with either or both of these evils; yet, strange to say, they violate this law more than others. Many say marriage is the law of protection, but in thousands of cases it is only legalized adultery. The law, or rather that part of this law of protection which gives best results, relates to the fruits of marriage. An abundant harvest makes a contented farmer. The law is universal. The bulk of family troubles have come from those of few or no children. If there is not a rich harvest something will have to come in to take the place of the blasted fruit and Satan will surely find something for them to do.

Again, I must make reference to another, an honored and eminent American woman-Marian Harlan. She plainly tells her sisters where the blame lies. It is in them more than any other, and that many in their declining days reflect in sorrow for their youthful folly. "It is not in the heyday of early life that a womanly woman knows the fullness of a longing for the companionship of daughters, who shall be fairer editions of herself, for the fond protection of manly sons, for all that motherhood brings of enlargement of her own better nature. The world can perhaps afford to get along without her children; she cannot." I hope this is hint enough to the wise on this point; but on the expense question I cannot refrain from quoting from another woman, Mrs. Mary Wallerstein, president of the "Woman's

Tired of rubbing? -Where's your last the Legal Aid Society of New York" who in a speech last fall before that body, urged a law to prohibit marriages unless the man desiring a wife is earning a salary of at least $21 per week. If this is not a leader to sin I badly mistake good signs. This from the boasting side of humanity speaks vo'umes.

Still another and very unlooked-for one plays an important part these days in tamily troubles. The free, independent spirit of this age is working sad havoc in many a peaceful and happy family. I have noticed this for some time, but Julius Ward, in "The Church in Modern Society," has worded it better than I can, so I will give his words: "In a free government where the democratic idea prevails alike in church and state, the family has felt the encroachment of the demand for personal freedom. Not only have men and women in the marriage relation stood up for personal rights against the concessions of the marriage contract, but the individual head of the family has been counted instead of the whole family itself, as the social unit of society. . . . The very play of this individual force has encouraged divorce and has stimulated independence between husband and wife, between children and parents, to a degree which has materially assailed the integrity of the home" (pp. 112, 113).

This is not the end of its work. It preaches far and wide in the moral realm. It has been the blighting wind that has destroyed the power of many Christians to grow in the grace of that life.

This question grows on my hands. I cannot stop where and when I first thought. There is a phase of this independent thought that must be noticed before I can properly conclude this article. We have been in the habit of seeing monstrous evils in and growing out of the Catholic acetic life, but have failed to see how rapidly the same are growing conditions otherwhere. Protestantism is nursing this thought though not naming or housing it quite as they are. It is growing faster and wider within our own ranks each year. There would be social sins should the thirty-year-olds have married at nearly half that age. We are also nursing many other evils that are sapping out the lifeblood of wedded bliss which I have not the time nor space here to mention, as I have already made this much longer than I intended at first, but hope the future wiil grant an opportunity to say

The Old Minister.

I read a poem in the Michigan Presbyterian, Shall the Old Minister be Shot?" No, we will ot shoot him, but some want to change the law nd take away his equality in the Presbytery. Vell, some of them love the Church more than heir lives, and I would as soon be shot as lose ny right in the Church. I wish you would print

DON'T.

Don't "shoot him" yet! Please don't, I pray! I know he's old and his locks are gray— That dear, good minister over the way; He was praying alone the other day, And what do you think I heard him say?

He said: "Dear Lord, I know I was sent To teach thy Word till my days were spent, And I've toiled so long in the good old way That I love to preach and I love to pray; But times are changed! and if 'tis thy will That my lips be mute and my voice be still, I'll bow me low on suppliant knee, And go, dear Lord, if thou biddest me."

Then his words were drowned in broken sighs. And tears rained down from his dear, dim eyes; But I know that the Holy Ghost can rest In an old as well as as a younger breast-And time-taught sermons are sometimes best So I beg once more that you'll let him stay; That he still may preach, and he still may pray-That dear old minister over the way! -Exchange.

Undeveloped Resources.

W. J. BURNER.

As the church is Christ's instrument in aving the world, the degree to which the astrument is adapted to the work measures he progress of the kingdom. Our "fellowhip in behalf of the gospel" is no greater han our ability to serve, and it is being aily demonstrated that the church has no trength to waste; that the service of all hristians is needed. "The age of big sernons is past," said a distinguished evangelst. The age of depending entirely on big ermons, or on any kind of sermons, is past, f there ever was such an age, but as yet we ave the ideal of a working church rather han the reality. Church architecture is an ndeveloped resource. Perhaps it is not one f great importance. In our childhood we vere accustomed to worship in a structure uilt after the fashion of a shoebox. In ne city of 10,000 inhabitants the building ccupied by the Disciples was popularly nown as "God's Barn." Of course, the day f such structures is past, but have we not ometimes preserved in our beautiful modrn buildings the essential defect of the old ne, namely, that it did not suggest God? A hurch may be beautiful and comfortable nd be no more adapted to a religious frame f mind than a theatre. It is not enough hat a church be artistic. It must be reigiously artistic, or we may regret the exggerated goodsbox. There must be somehing holy and reverent about it, something hat impresses on the heart the thought of lod. Perhaps one reason why our religion o constantly expresses itself in feverish ctivity and fervid exhortation rather than n worship is that we do not have a place specially fitted for worship.

Another undeveloped resource is that of song. Congregational singing is desired by all of us, but how many churches make provision for the musical instruction necessary to the success of congregational singing? One hunered dollars per annum judiciously expended will result in a far greater improvement in singing than any amount of abuse of the choir system. Our songs, those in most common use, are calculated to "put the rousement" into a revival meeting, but not to produce a calmly devotional frame of mind. They show the effect of our constant emphasis upon "getting additions." If any one will note the songs most commonly sung in the congregation he will often find that the words contain no poetry and the music no inspiration. He will find in them a constant illustration of the truth that this is a fast age. Revivalists select songs as some med select horses, for their speed. The song should call forth from the depths of our hearts "praise, adoration, aspiration, trust, contrition, supplication;" should fire the Christian soldier with ardor for the battle; should breathe healing sympathy upon the broken heart and speak of divine forgiveness to the contrite spirit. Religious feeling is great and noble, and nothing small and weak can express it or call it forth. People cannot really worship God with jingles and cant, though they may think they do. The religious feeling that slumbers in man for lack of something to call it forth is a resource that should be developed.

Another thing worthy of attention is the public reading of the Scriptures, and the participation of the congregation in the reading. "Reading the lesson" is not. as a usual thing, a very effective performance. It is frequently not at all devotional, but serves as an assistant to the sermon. The elocution of many preachers is poor, and the attention of the congregation wanes after the first ten verses. Let not our dread of being like somebody else prevent our having the congregation take part in this service. Here is something worth developing, is it not? An effective service of Scripture reading may not be easily attained, but the object is worthy of considerable effort.

Something might be done to improve what we call the communion service. We all realize with pleasure that it is not what it once was. When I was young I frequently attended (under protest) a church that was very, very old. In one of the first sermons which I remember to have heard the preacher proved that this church was the church set up on the day of Pentecost. I supposed he meant this particular congregation, and I did not doubt its antiquity, though I speculated for a long time as to the manner of its transportation to America. In this congregation it was the custom for a venerable elder, whom I suspected of having also been set up on the day of Pentecost, to gravely take hss place at the table and give a synopsis of the sermon, lingering lovingly and long upon such points as needed emphasis. In this way he cautiously approached "the institution which was instituted on the night Jesus was betrayed," and he never failed to detail all the circumstances. This was wearisome, and we abbreviate the service now, but did it not hold an idea that we have lost, and that we could ill afford to

Took Her Religion Along.

A beautiful instance of Christian integrity is given of a distinguished Christian lady who was spending a few weeks at a hotel at Long Branch.

An attempt was made to induce her to attend a dance in order that the affair might have the prestige bestowed by her presence, as she stood high in society. She declined all the importunities of her friends.

Finally, an honorable Senator tried to persuade her to attend, saying, "Miss B---, this is quite a harmless affair, and we want the exceptional honor of your presence."

"Senator," said the lady, "I never do anything in my summer vacation, or wherever I go, that will injure the influence I have over the girls of my Sunday-school class."

The Senator bowed and said, "I honor you; if there were more Christians like you, more men like myself would become Christians."

The Workingman's Place.

W. W. HOPKINS.

If the laboring men and women of the United States would only keep their places. work full time, extra time and over time, live a life of self-denial and take whatever wages their employers are pleased to give them, and keep their mouths shut, there would be no strikes, no industrial upheavals, no disturbances of the peace in the land. Certainly not. But to do this the dial hand of time would have to be moved backwards about three hundred years. Our schoolhouses would have to be closed and we should have to cease telling men of the kingdom of God and his righteousness. Education of the masses would have to be done away with and all the fountains of sympathy dried up. Then and not till then would the laboring man become the willing slave of his master and gratefully lay, year by year, the fruits of his faithful, patient service at the feet of his master. Then would he be able to say to his beloved companion in life, Behold how good and kind it was in our beloved and honored master to give us food, raiment and shelter for our poor service. Then would he be able to say to his children, The good things of this world are not for those who labor, but for our rich lords. You must not, therefore, covet fine clothes, good food, books, an education or the good things of this life, which belong only to the rich and to the mighty, lest you disturb their peace: but seek to do the will of your master which is on earth and to please him and live and work for his comfort and his wealth all the days of your life. That you may do him the greatest honor and more largely enhance his wealth it will be your duty to deny yourself of every possible comfort, even to the barest necessities of life, even as your unworthy parents have done all the days of their life; for upon this depends law and order, peace and good government.

How unfortunate for those who seek to get rich that schools were ever invented or that Jesus Christ ever visited this earth. Prior to that event whole nations were the willing servants of the mighty and the great men of the world, but the new code of ethics taught and lived by Christ upset all this, put foolish notions in the heads of the common people, and there has been no peace on the earth since. No wonder he (Christ) was put to death. What right had such a disturber of the world's peace, such an anarchist, to live? And did he (Christ) not even boast that he came not to send peace but a sword on earth? If we would be rich and enjoy our riches in peace, then our duties ar- plain. We must rid ourselves of schools and colleges, of the idea of the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, Christian ethics in business, and of representative governments and drive the workingman back into ignorant, passive submission, make our own laws, appoint our own rulers and keep things in our own hands. Then and not till then will we succeed. For the other side of this picture read "Publi and Private Rights" by the writer. Price, 15 cents. 1522 Locust St., St. Louis, Mo.

How a Tornado Starts.

One of the most interesting facts concerning tornadoes is the record of how one began. The account was sent to the Weather Bureau by one of its observers. The following is an abstract:

By A. H. Gale, Voluntary Observer at Bassett, Neb.

Dated, July 28, 1899.

Mr. A. Brown, five and a half miles northwest of Johnstown, saw the tornado form. He was at work in his barnyard and noticed it coming across his field as a light summer whirlwind, such as is noticed on any still, hot day. Air at the time was calm. Mr. Brown says he was harnessing a horse, and as the light whirl passed him it gently lifted the straw edges of the roof of his cowshed, but had not enough strength to lift his hat, and passed on. At this point it was devoid of any color; and was mainly noticed by the whirl it made among the grass, straw and chaff on the ground; he watched its onward movement indifferently, and soon saw it gather a color which made it definable. He then paid close attention to it and noticed it becoming black, angry and gyrating vigorously; chips, straws and dirt fell into it and were absorbed by it and a smoky veil began to envelop the whirling column as it mounted upward. At the same time a funnel began to lower itself from a turbulent low-hanging cloud of an area of about forty acres; the column and funnel soon connected and with this union the "thing" took on a terrifying aspect; up to this time he had no feeling of apprehension. When the whirl passed him he said he was aware of its passage only by its action on the ground. No color. A black cloud above, in commotion, followed the whirl on the ground, which latter was eight or ten feet in diameter. This cloud was alone, seperate and clear from a higher stratta of storm clouds above. When passing his point and as long as within his line of view, he estimated the speed at 10 miles per hour, line of path east by south. I will say here that the entire path from start to end was 18 to 19 miles and in that distance it made a southing from a due east course of 23 miles, and ranged from one to three rods in width. Two and one-half miles from Mr. Brown's point it crossed a large cornfield and here it received much coloring matter. That the affair was at this time in comfortable order was demonstrated by the shock it gave the the first house it struck as it left the cornfield, Mr. John Strohm's. Mr. Strohm and his family saw it as it rose along the slant of the cornfield to his house on its edge, and dove for the cellar. The destruction at this place was complete; house of heavy logs, windmill and tower and stable, in all seven buildings, completely leveled to the ground, fences upset, broken down. Fence wire woven and interwoven with broken lumber, straw, debris of all sorts, plastered with mud. Every fence post standing in the track formed a dam around which was massed debris of everything imaginable, the whole daubed with mud; it was a picture of desolation and ruin-dismal in the extreme. "Oh, papa, write a reprieve and let me run with it!" cries the princess, and she laid before the king paper, pen and ink. "Where are my spectacles?" the monarch exclaimed. "Angelica, go up into my bedroom, look under my pillow, there you'll see the keys. The spectacles are in my desk." When the spectacles were got, the king mended his pen and signed the reprieve. "You'd better stay, my love, and finish the muffins. Be sure, it's too late. Hand me over that raspbery jam, please," said the monarch. "Bong! bewong! There goes the half hour. I knew it!"

Swift as the wind Angelica ran and ran and ran and ran and ran. She ran down High Street and over the bridge and up the blind alley and round by the castle and she came—she came to the execution place, where she saw Bulbo laying his head on the block. The executioner raised his ax. "Reprieve!" screamed Angelica. Up the scaffold stairs she sprang and flinging herself into Bulbo's arms, regardless of ceremony, she cried out: "O, my prince, my lord, thine Angelica hath been in time!"

"I tell you what it is, Angelica," said Bulbo, looking very uncomfortable; "since I came here yesterday there has been such a disturbance and chopping of heads that I am inclined to go back to Crim Tartary." You will remember that Angelica no longer wore the magic ring that made gentlemen love her, so this will account for Bulbo's coolness.

"But with me as thy bride, Bulbo, wherever thou art is Crim Tartary to me, rosebud."

"Well, well, I suppose we must be married," says Bulbo. "Doctor, you came to read the funeral service—read the marriage service, will you? What must be, must." So, married they were, and I am sure, for my part, I trust they will be happy.

But we must now revert to the little maid, Rosalba. Alas, and woe is me! Very lamentable events had happened to Rosalba this same morning, and all in consequence of that fatal warming-pan business of the previous night. The king had offered to marry her; of course, her majesty, the queen, was jealous. Giglio was in love with her, and O, what a furor Countess Gruffanuff was in! "Quit the premises!" says the queen. "Give her the rags she wore when she came into the house and turn her out of it." Countess Gruffanuff (who was Angelica's ex-governess, as I have told you before) went to the glass box in which she had kept Rosalba's old cloak and the one shoe. Poor Rosalba huddled the cloak round her back, on which was embroidered PRIN . . ROSALBA-between which words was a rent. As for the shoe, what could she do with one poor little tootsey sandal? The string was still to it, so she hung it round her neck. Gruffanuff drove her along with the poker-drove her down the cold stairs-flung her out into the cold street. Rosalba wandered on and on, till she passed through the town gates. "Ah," thought she as the stage coach passed her, of which the conductor was blowing a delightful tune on his horn, "how I should like to be on that coach." She little knew that Giglio rode in that very coach, though very likely she was thinking of him at the time. For that very morning Prince Giglio ran up to his room, packed up his trunks, had in a couple of porters and was off in the early stage in a twinkling.

Rosalba met the empty cart returning from market, and the driver being a kind man, and seeing such a pretty girl trudging along with bare feet, gave her a seat. The carter put a cloth around her feet, and gave her some bread and bacon, and was very kind. For all that, she was cold and melancholy. When, after traveling on and on. evening came and the black pines were bending with snow, there at last was the comfortable light beaming in the old carter's window. His children were just at supper with nice hot bread and milk. When their father arrived they laughed and clapped their hands, for they were good children and he had brought them toys from town. When they saw the pretty stranger, they brought her to the fire and rubbed her poor feet and gave her bread and milk. "Look, father, at this pretty girl, and at her pretty cold feet, as white as milk," they said. "And see her old cloak, just like the velvet that hangs in the cupboard, which you found the day King Padella killed the little bears. And, bless us all! she bas around her neck just such another little shoe as you brought home-a blue velvet shoe."

"What," said the old man, "what is all is about a shoe and a cloak?" Rosalba exthis about a shoe and a cloak?" plained how she had left the palace when a little child; she remembered being in a forest, and perhaps it was a dream-it was so strange-having lived in a cave with lions, and before that having lived in a fine house, as fine as the king's. The carter went to the cupboard and produced the shoe in which was written: "Hopkins, maker to the royal family." So in he other shoe was "Hopkins, maker to the royal family." He produced the piece of velvet on which was embroidered "CESS," so when you put it with the cloak, you read: "PRINCESS ROSALBA." On seeing this, the dear old carter fell upon his knees, saying: "O, my princess, I do thee homage." And he rubbed his venerable nose three times on the ground. Now, Rosalba had read all the customs of foreign courts. "Thou must be one of my father's noblemen," she said. "I make thee knight. Rise, Marquis of Spinak!" And with indescribable majesty the queen, who had no sword handy, waved the pewter spoon, with which she had been taking her bread and milk, over the bald head of the nobleman, whose tears absolutely made a puddle on the ground and whose dear children went to bed that night all lords and ladies. But fearful indeed were to be the dangers of Queen Rosalba before she could hope to drive that hateful usurper, King Padella, from her rightful throne-King Padella, the father of Prince Bulbo!

W. F. RICHARDSON.

THE MAN BORN BLIND.*

The Feast of Tabernacles, one of the three great annual festivals of the Jews, was on hand. It was held in the morth Tisri, the seventh month of the Jewish year, answering to our October. It lasted from the 15th to the 22nd of the month and was celebrated with elaborate and joyous ceremonies. Following but a few days after the Day of Atonement, when the yearly intercession of the high priest had once more put away the sins of the people, it would naturally be a time of great rejoicing. But it was also the celebration of the end of harvest, when the fruits from orchard and vineyard were all gathered in, and this would likewise make it a happy season. Chiefly, however, it commemorated the journeying of Israel through the wilderness and their sojourning therein for forty years without fixed habitations. It reminded them of the divine protection and supply that were theirs through all that wonderful time. During this feast the people lived in booths, and many symbolic ceremonies were conducted which appealed to the spiritual in them and served to keep alive in the national heart an expectation of the coming reign and rich benefactions of the Messiah.

Jesus did not go up to this feast with his relatives, notwithstanding they challenged him to show in Jerusalem the evidences of his divine mission, as it was reported he had done throughout Galilee. For many of his own family did not yet believe on him; but about the middle of the week he suddenly appeared in the temple teaching the people. We have the record of some of his discourses in the seventh and eighth chapters of John's Gospel. The reading of these two chapters shows that the enmity to him was now deepening and concentrating, and that the party seeking his condemnation and death was steadily growing. His stern rebukes of the captious priests and Pharisees and his high claims to be the Messiah and the Son of God, a claim which he no longer veiled by indirect speech, filled the hearts of the religious leaders with a fury of anger that finally led to an effort to stone him. But his hour had not yet come, and he hid himshlf from them and passed out from the temple.

Either on this same day or on the succeeding Sabbath, as Jesus passed along the street his compassion was called forth by the spectacle of a blind beggar well known in the city, whose affliction dated from his birth. His disciples asked him whether this blindness was due to the man's own sin or that of his parents. It is uncertain whether the Jews of that day shared in the occult opinions so common in the Far Orient regarding the transmigation of souls and the consequent possibility of one's having sinned in a previous state of being or merely that they believed it possible for a child to sin before birth. What is certain is that they believed, as did the Jews generally, that physical suffering was the result of the individual's sin or that of his parents, an opinion which is held in some quarters to-day. Jesus showed their error by declaring the true end of all suffering, that God might work his grace into the sufferer's heart and life. The disciples looked only to find the occasion of the affliction; Jesus taught its higher purpose, its ultimate end-that which, in the light of eternity, should reconcile a suffering race with a loving Creator and Father. He was getting ready to teach his disciples the lesson thay afterwards so often repeated for the consolation of anguished souls, that "all things work together for good to them that love God." It is vas:ly more comforting to study the moral purpose in suffering than to curiously speculate upon the question of its causes.

Jesus busied himself in "manifesting the works of God" upon those poor unfortunates and begrudged the day or hour that was not spent in doing good. He felt that the day of his earthly ministry must soon end and that he must let his light shine in the world with constant ray if he would fulfill the will of the Father who sent him. Thus speaking he stooped over and spat upon the ground and, making ointment of the clay and spittle, rubbed it on the eyes of the blind man and told him to go to the pool of Siloam and wash. This pool lay at the southern end of the hill Ophel, south of the temple enclosure, and was but a short walk from the temple itself. The blind man groped his way to Siloam and washed, and lo! his sight came to him perfectly and he returned into the city rejoicing. We can imagine the eagerness with which he would visit his home and those of his friends to look for the first time upon the scenes and faces which he had known only by the sense of touch. To all their inquiries as to the method of the wonderful cure he had experienced he could tell but the simple story: "The man that is called Jesus made clay and anointed mine eyes, and said unto me, Go to Siloam and wash: so I went away and washed, and I received sight."

Knowing that this miracle, if not explained away, would cause many of the people to believe in Jesus, the Pharisees attempt to bring from the healed man or from his parents some explanation which should deprive Jesus of the credit of the cure. But they failed in this. The man himself sticks to his simple story, and when they demand of him to decide a puzzling question of casuistry he turns away from it with the unanswerable rejoinder: "One thing I know, that whereas I was blind, now I see." Blessed assurance, worth a thousand theories! So may every redeemed soul, conscious of the new affections that fill the heart. rejoicing in the sweet hopes that animate the spirit, answer a thousand doubts of the scoffer: "I know him in whom I believe; and I am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed to him against that day." The parents of the healed man refuse to be brought into the controversy, and asserting that he is their son and that he was born blind, refer the Pharisees to the object of Jesus' miracle for a statement of the cure. It had already been determined that if any one should confess faith in Jesus as the Messiah he should be "turned out of the synagogue," or excommunicated, which to the pious Jew meant about as serious a spiritual calamity as the like fate to a devout Roman Catholic of to-day. But the happy man whose sight had been given him by the prophet of Nazareth had by that same cure been delivered from his fear of the Pharisaic threats, and he boldly declared his belief that Jesus was a prophet and a man of God. They thrust him out of the synagogue, therefore, and bade him go his way, an outcast from his people and from his father's house. Doubtless it was with a sad heart that he turned his face to the future which had in it none of the sacred religious and social privileges so dear to the heart of every child of Abraham. But his sorrow was speedily turned into joy. For the one Friend who never forgets nor forsakes had witnessed his fidelity and was about to reward it. Jesus did not wait to be searched for by the poor man, but himself went to seek him. And when he found him he asked him: "Dost thou believe on the Son of God?" Already, perhaps, it had begun to dawn upon the soul of this devout and grateful Jew that this Jesus who had given him his sight must be the Messiah, and therefore divine. He tremblingly answers: "And who is he, Lord, that I may believe on him?" Jesus said un him: "Thou hast both seen him, and it is he the speaketh with thee." The glad confession the had been waiting eagerly for utterance no sprang from his lips: "Lord, I believe." And I fell before the Son of God in reverential worshi He had lost his membership in the synagogue, be he had found a place in the Father's house, cloby the loving side of the Elder Brother. Oh, the every blinded soul whose pathway sin has darked ed would hear the voice of the Son of Godirecting to the fountain of his own cleans in blood, bidding them to wash and see!

THE WOES OF THE DRUNKARD.

(Prov. 23:29-35)

No man liveth to himself, and no man sinneth to himself. It is a grave mistake for a man to suppose that it is nobody's business but his own when he goes wrong and that he injures nobody but himself in his debauches. As time goes on he will see only too clearly the effects of his sin upon those he loves most. At first he thinks he only inconveniences some comrade to bring him home. and some member of his family to see him to bed. This may last for a time and he be ignorant of the gashes he cuts in hearts be loves. Later he loses business, then money in large sums, then a whole fortune, and when it is too late to retrieve he sees wife or mother toiling for his living and her own and wrecking health and happiness-for what? Because he has had fun? No, but because he has sought elusive pleasure and ended in a splitting headache and broken hearts. Is there any satisfaction that way?

To late to retrieve? No. There are few diseases incurable, and no appetites. Read De Quincy's Confessions of an Opium Eater, and say if the process of reform there is not longer and sterner than any whisky drunkard would ever be likely to face. Undoubtedly the woes of coming out of drunkenness are physically more intense than a sloven remaining in; but then how about the manhood in it? How about the joy of exertion? How about fierce, fighting enthusiasm? Is there no compensation there? I know a prominent man of large family and influence who lest all-wealth, friendships, self-respect, respect of his children, and was reduced to a common guttersnipe. He determined to reform one day, and reform he did. He went to a friend's in the country, and for weeks he walked the woods and fields, day and night, scarce sleeping, scarce eating, in terrible agony, like a maniac. But he won his fight, and to-day is a most honored and respected high official in one of our states. It takes manhood to make that sort of stand, and yet there is enough manhood given if sought. Which is to be preferred for satisfaction-that man's life in the gutter, or on the supreme bench?

Perhaps there are very few of us who cannot speak eloquently and feelingly upon the woes of the drunkard. The difficulty is that the drunkards will not be at our meeting. Those who are in danger of becoming drunkards may be present, but not likely. Nevertheless, it is always worth while to hold up the woes of an evil thing when we know whereof we speak-and alas! most of us know only too well about this-to create sentiment against it. Too strong a repugnance for beastliness in any form cannot be created. Let all possible be done and said-but always in good taste and moderation, lest we be charged with intemperance in mouthing words, and always with an eyewitnesses' knowledge of what we speak-or witness well-nigh as good-to put signboards along the dangerous way.

The great insurrection in the Chinese Empire, which threatens to involve the United States and the other great nations of the world, has naturally aroused an increased interest in the "Flowery Kingdom." THE CHRISTIAN PUBLISHING COMPANY. ST. LOUIS, MO.

The Acme.... Smelting and Refining Company

Offers to Investors for a Short Time Unequaled Advantages.

IT IS A WELL-KNOWN FACT

That a custom smelter, properly equipped and operated, is the most certain source of revenue in the mining business

ITS SUCCESS

Is not contingent upon the output of any one mine or group of mines, but draws its support from a large number of mines in the district where it is located. There are 100 producing and paying mines within a convenient distance of our smelter site and at least 200 more would be developed if there was a custom smelter conveniently located to which ore could be shipped for treatment.

A CUSTOM SMELTER

Bears the same relation to mining that a grist mill does to an agricultural district, with the profits greatly in favor of a custom smelter. The usual net profits of a custom smelter are about $3.00 per ton.

WE HAVE GIVEN YEARS

Of careful study to our plans and know that we are warranted in our undertaking-the erection of a custom smelting plant. Risks which exist in all ordinary mining operations have been carefully eliminated We have water, fluxes, an inexhaustible supply of ore and a clear field.

WE CONTRACT NO DEBTS. OUR MOTTO IS: CASH or NOTHING.

A CUSTOM SMELTER HAS THESE ADVANTAGES OVER ALL KINDS OF COMMERCIAL BUSINESS:

- The product of a smelter invariably sells for cash.
- The ore smelted is ample security for the expense of smelting.
- Profits are always large, often reaching 50 per cent. annually on the par value of the stock. Charges for smelting are always collected before the "matte" or refined ore is delivered from the smelter.
 - A custom smelter has no bad debts.
 - A gold smelter's out-put never fluctuates in value.
- 7. A gold smelter is absolutely independent of any financial stringency, business stagnation, politica disturbance, or other calamity which jeopardizes all ordinary classes of investments.

Our Board of Directors is a Guarantee of Safety to all Investors. -It is composed of

HON. C. C. COLE, Late Chief Justice of Iowa.

HON. WEBSTER STREET, Chief Justice of Arizona.

Literature

"Man and His Divine Father," by Jno. C. C. Clarke, D. D. A. C. McClerg & Co., Chicago. $1.50. This is a philosophical treatise from a conservative point of view of the subject of divinity. It is an attempt "to find the line and system of plain truth." It takes up the philosophy of mind and spirit—the divine person and man's relations thereto—human hopes and immortality. It contains a treatment also on "Philo, the Alexandrian Jew." One section is the Philosophy of the New Testament.

"Let There be Light," by David Lubin. The author is of Jewish stock, and in this book makes an effort to set forth a reconstruction of social order and religious systems. It is in the form of a story of a workingmen's club, in which are discovered many inequalities and affairs that need readjustment and amelioration. The style is somewhat labored and the speeches tedious, yet it is bold and radical. The author deals in his own original way with such themes as Humanity and Business, Charity of Rich and Poor, True Monotheism, Sacred and Secular, Faith and Rea son, Equity and Justice, etc. Any one interested in social questions and present-day problems viewed from a religious standpoint will profit from this first-hand treatment. Price, $1.50. Putnam's Sons, New York.

"Prophets of the Nineteenth Century," by May Alden Ward, are essays on Carlyle, Ruskin and Tolstoi. It traces an inner, spiritual oneness of these three great writers and sets forth in a clear, forcible style the message of each one. It is biographical and interpretative and gives one enough insight to create a desire to know more of their respective messages. It is appetizing, but satisfying to busy people, who want an outline of these prophetic messages. Little, Brown & Co. Price, 75 cents.

"Deeper Yet," or meditations for the Quiet Hour, by Clarence E. Eberman, is another one of the numerous devotional books. It is quiet in tone and will prove helpful. The chapters are short, and it deals with such inviting themes as The Divine Partnership, God's Vigilance, Heart Hymns, In God We Trust. Price, 50 cents. United Society of Christian Endeavor, Boston, Mass.

"As the Light Led," by Jas. Newton Baskett, is a book of unusual interest to the Christian Church. The story is laid in Missouri and deals with the early days when the people called "Campbellites" were fighting for their existence. It gives in a few strokes a sketch of one of the old-time debates between a Christian and a Methodist preacher on baptism. The heroine of the story is a member of the Christian Church, and "Bent," her suitor, a Methodist; each was led by the best light. The story is well written, contains a good deal of humor and is pervaded with a sentiment of old-fashioned, homespun philosophy—quaint, rich and rare. Price, $1.50. Macmillan & Co., New York.

"The Reign of Law," by Jas. Lane Allen, is more artistically written. There is a fascination and a charm about its style that is irresistible. It is a story of the hempfields of Kentucky, and contains much about the Bible School at Lexington. It traces the history of a boy who goes up from the hempfields to study for the ministry; how he becomes dissatisfied with prevailing ideas of the school and is carried out into doubt, and finally goes back to the farm; thence to a Northern college. It gives in a very graphic and clear manner the transition of thought of this century. The customs and manners of the Disciples is told with mingled humor and pathos. In a way it condemns the narrowness and bigotry of the times and shows how such a spirit will hamper a young man. On the other hand it shows how a young man may lose his bearings when he once breaks with the old paths. Price, $1.50. Macmillan & Co., New York.

MAGAZINES.

McCall's Magazine for September is out with its handsome illustrations of patterns o' stylish designs for ladies, misses and children. The table of contents shows a list of attractive themes treated in addition to the styles of dress illustreted. The price of this elegant magazine is only 50 cents per year, or five cents per copy, and in addition each subscriber receives a free pattern of her own selection. The McCall Co., 146 W. 14th St., New York City.

On the cover of the August number of the Ledger Monthly is a colored picture of a piquant country girl, a sprig of hay between her smiling lips, giving her an arch expression, with the humorous title "A Hayseed." The frontispiece is a characteristic Southern scene, an old Virginia colored parson meeting two members of his flock in a two-wheel ox cart, and stopping to chat on the way. A special feature of this number is a double page of illustrations of Old Colonial Taverns, with an interesting descriptive article by Waldon Fawcett. The price of the Ledger Monthly is 50 cents a year. Address Ledger Building, New York City.

The terrible scenes of bloodshed and political and religious upheaval in China have riveted all eyes on that unhappy empire. The situation is described from many view-points in the Missionary Review of the World for August. Rev. J. H. Worley writes of the "Recent Troubles," Rev. P. W. Pitcher of "Treaty Rights and Missions," Dr. J. T. Gracey of "The Clash of Civilizations," Rev. Wm. Cornaby of "Chinese Riots and Reparations," and Rev. W. O. Elterich of the "Causes of the Trouble." The wonderful power of the gospel in China and the difficulties encountered in proclaiming it to the Chinese is graphically and powerfully described by Dr. Griffith John in a full account of "The Gospel in Hunan"—the bitterly anti-foreign province of China. Published monthly by Funk & Wagnalls Co., 30 Lafayette Place, New York. $2.50 a year.

The political campaign and the Chinese problem are the two most prominent topics in the August Review of Reviews. In "The Progress of the World" the editor analyzes the platform adopted by the Democrats at Kansas City. Among the contributed articles there is a brief review of the work of the Kansas City convention by Walter Wellman, followed by personal sketches of "Mr. Bryan at Home," "Theodore Roosevelt," by Jacob A. Riis, and "Roosevelt's Work as Governor." "The Chinese Revolution" is the subject of a well-informed and timely paper by Stephen Bonsal. Important phases of the situation in China are also set forth editorially.

The August number of the North American Review affords a most suggestive illustration of the splendid service which a great editor renders his readers in conducting a great magazine. While the general contents are as varied as the more important interests of the hour, the topic which is filling the mind and absorbing the sympathies of the world is treated with a fullness and comprehensiveness which will illuminate the situation for those who are anxiously seeking light upon it. Seven articles are devoted to "The Crisis in China," and each of them regards it or discusses it from a different point of view.

National Convention Notes.

A GOOD HALL SECURED.

Our brethren everywhere will be pleased to hear that a suitable hall has at last been secured for our National Convention, which is to meet in Kansas City next October. The committee has secured Armory Hall, on the crossing of two street car lines, to which all lines in the city make transfers. This is a very convenient location. It is a central one, and a half hour's ride from the farthest point in the city will bring the delegates to the hall for one fare. The hall will seat about three thousand people. The acoustic properties of the building are excellent, and three thousand people is all one speaker can make hear. Then we have two churches within five minutes' walk of Armory Hall, which will accommodate fifteen hundred each for overflow meetings. First Church, 11th and Locust, will be headquarters.

THE ATTENDANCE.

In a recent Sunday edition of the Kansas City Times the paper estimated that this would be one of the greatest conventions of this wonderful convention year for Kansas City. The Times said the convention would bring at least twenty thousand people to Kansas City. This statement was made without any authority from our executive committee. We do expect about five thousand delegates, from what the different excursion managers write. Send in your name to the state secretary in your state that you are going to the convention. We can make some estimate of how many are coming if you do that. Do not fail to talk up the convention among your brethren in the local church Those who read our papers must do the stirring up. Tell of some gathering of our brethren where you were present and what a blessing it was for you to be there. It takes some time for news to filter down through the brotherhood. Begin now to talk about it.

RAILROAD RATES.

The Central, Southern and Western Passenger Associations have given one fare for the round trip plus $2.00. Within a radius of two hundred miles from Kansas City one fare and a third. We hope to do better than that, for Missouri and Kansas must furnish half the delegates, and we must have a better rate. Above all keep in touch with your state secretary, and you will help to get good rates for yourself and others.

THE ADDRESSES.

These will be all first-class Most of them will be made by some of our rising young men. Remember, "some of" our rising young men in the pulpit. It would take a six months' session to hear from them all, for the woods are full of rising young men in our ministry, and it would pay you to travel across the country to hear them. It would make you prouder of our brotherhood to hear them. There are hundreds who have stood the burden and heat of the day that you ought to hear, but we will not have the time, an hundreds more will not be there.

Then you will hear and see our missionaries from the home and foreign field. It would be worth your while to come for this alone. They are our representatives. You have some ownership of them because you have made sacrifices to help keep them in the field. You and they are soldiers of the cross. It will be a meeting of the constituency and respesentatives of that constituency. Do not allow the "one-third rate" or the "plus two dollars" to keep you away. You spend from two to three dollars on yourself for something that is vanishing and fleeting and never miss it. Arrange to come to Kansas City

CURRENT EVENTS.

Developments of both a military and dip matic character in reference to China ave been of considerable importance during he pas week. The allied forces have met he Chinese at Peitsang, about twelve miles rom Tien-Tsin and have defeated them after spirited contest of about four hours. The oss to the allied armies was reported to be welve hundred, but this will probably rove to be an exaggeration. It does not ppear that the Americans were engaged in his battle. Later dispatches from General haffee, report a second victory of the llied forces resulting in the capture of ang-Tsun, with a loss of about two hunred, of which sixty belong to the American roops. Yang-Tsun is at the junction of the ei Ho River, and the railroad leading to ekin, and is about eighteen miles from Tiensin. The news of these two victories, the atter of which was much more easily won han the first, gives evidence that the Chiese will probably not make so stubborn a esistance as was feared at first. In diplonacy the United States Government seems o be leading the way in its strong demands pon China. It is evident that the Chinese dovernment is anxious to get rid of the minsters, and would gladly re ease them from Pekin under escort for Tien-Tsin if by so loing it could prevent the invasion by the llied forces of the Chinese capital. Miniser Conger believes, however, that if the ninisters leave Pekin they will be slaughered on the way, and he naturally protests gainst this solution of the problem. It is eported that our government is insisting in ery strong terms that the Chinese Government put the diplomatic representatives of he powers in immediate and free communiation with their respective governments nd to remove all danger to their lives and iberty, and that the imperial authorities of China co-operate with the relief expedition or the liberation of the legations, for the rotection of foreigners and the restoration f order. There is no indication at present hat the Chinese Government intends to comly with this request. It cannot be said hat there is yet a clear understanding of he relation of the imperial power of China o this uprising of the Boxers and their outages, but the situation may be described as ery grave and one that will test to the utnost the courage, wisdom and diplomatic kill of all the powers concerned.

For some time the situation in South Afica has been overshadowed by the news rom China. Military operations under Lord Roberts, however, have continued, in which British armies have been generally victorious, with an exceptional bold raid now and then by the Boer forces, in which they have gained temporary advantage. The Daily News of London contains a dispatch from Pretoria of the 9th inst. revealing a plot to shoot all the British officers and to make Lord Roberts a prisoner. Ten of the ringleaders have been arrested and are now in jail. It is believed that the plot was a part of a conspiracy, of which the attempted rising at Johannesburg was the first indication. The plan seems to have been to set fire to the houses in the extreme western part of the city, hoping that the troops would be concentrated there. The conspirators were then to enter forcibly all the houses occupied by British officers, which had previously been marked, and to kill the occupants. It is reported that all the Boer sympathizers were acquainted with the plot and that several had been toled off to secure the person of Lord Roberts and to hurry with him to the n arest commando. It is said that this plot was discovered just in time to prevent its being carried out. A number of the townspeople of Pretoria are said to be implicated in the plot and they were in communication with the enemy. The capture and killing was to have taken place on Tuesday evening of last week. Later news may throw some further light upon this reported conspiracy. If this report should be confirmed it would appear that the war in South Africa has degenerated into something a great deal worse.

The formal notification of Mr. Bryan and Mr. Stevenson of their nomination as candidates for the Presidency and Vice-Presidency of the United States by the Democratic party took place at Indianapolis on the 8th inst. and was made the occasion of a popular demonstration. The notification speech for Mr. Bryan was made by Mr. Richardson, chairman of the Democratic convention. Mr. Bryan's response was a carefully prepared speech, read from manuscript, and was devoted solely to "imperialism," the "paramount issue" as defined by the Kansas City platform. Perhaps the most important statement in Mr. Bryan's speech is the following:

"There is an easy, honest, honorable solution of the Philippine question. It is set forth in the Democratic platform and it is submitted with confidence to the American people. If elected I will convene Congress in extraordinary session as soon as inaugurated, and recommend an immediate declaration of the nation's purpose, first, to establish as table form of government in the Philippine Islands, just as we are now establishing a stable form of government in Cuba; second, to give independence to the Filipinos just as we have promised to give independence to the Cubans; third, to protect the Filipinos from outside interference while they work out their destiny, just as we have protected the republics of Central and South America, and are, by the Monroe doctrine, pledged to protect Cuba."

It will be observed that of the three items in this program only one differs from that pursued by the present administration. Both agree that the first thing to do is to "establish a stable form of government in the Philippine Islands" Both believe in protecting the Filipinos from "outside interfer-The point of difference is that Mr. Bryan, if elected, would convene Congress in extra session and recommend the above program, one part of which is to promise ultimate independence to the Filipinos. Just what Mr. Bryan would do in case the Filipinos should tell him they were quite able to establish a stable government of their own without the aid of this government, he of course does not say. He will cross that that stream when he comes to it. The alternative would then be between establishing a government without "the consent of the governed," or leaving them alone, subject to "outside interference" In such an issue no one doubts that Mr. Bryan would be patriot and statesman enough to go on with his "stable government," trusting for the "consent" of the malcontents later on They have already been promised by the commissioners self-government as rapidly as they show themselves capable of using it. It does not appear, after all, therefore, that there is much difference between the two parties in the actual course they would pursue toward the Philippines. The "paramount issue" reduces itself to the difference between promising the Filipinos independence when a "stable government" is established and promising them self-government as rapidly as they show themselves capable of exercising it.

Agreeably to the declared purpose of this government to give Cuba self-government at the earliest practicable moment an order has been issued to the Cubans from Washington permitting them to meet in convention in September for the purpose of framing a constitution for the island. The pride which the Cubans will doubtless take in this step toward self-government, together with the order that prevailed in their late municipal election, give assurance that the forthcoming constitutional convention will be conducted in a manner worthy of that people. The withdra al of troops from the island, for China, seems to create no spirit of rebellion or disorder on the part of the Cubans and is a further evidence of their confidence in the intentions of this government in aiding them to their independence. It is believed that they are capable of self-government, and they are not disappointing those who so believe when opportunities to show their intentions and their ability come to them.

Baron Russell, lord chi f justice of England, died Augu t 10th from the immediate effects of a surgical operation performed on the previous day for gastric catarrh. As the sickness of Lord Russell was not generally known his death came as a great surprise to England. The surgical operation was the result of a conference of four of London's most noted medical doctors. Lord Russell's fame as a lawver was won before the Parnell commission, appointed in 1888, to investigate the charges made by the Times against Parnell. At the death of Lord Coleridge he was appointed chief justice of England and one of the first cases that came before him in his high office was that of Dr. Jamison and his followers for the famous Transvaal raid. Lord Russell several times visited America and made the leading address before the American Bar Association at Saratoga, N. Y., in 1896. He was born in Newry, Ireland, in 1832; and educated at Trinity College in Dublin. He was formerly known as Sir Charles Russell until his election to parl ament in 1880. In 1885 he became attorney-general in Gladstone's cabinet.

At this writing the allied troops are supposed to be at the gates of Pekin. After the battle of Peitsang no great resistance seems to have been encountered. Chinese troops seem to have become disheartened. The latest word from Conger is that their situation was desperate, but would hold out until troops arrived. They were again under fire from the Imperial troops, and also short of rations. Expected food supply to be exhausted in ten days. The dispatches were dated August 6th. The Imperial government has empowered Li Hung Chang to treat with the powers for peace, but nothing will be done until the lives of the foreigners in Pekin are out of jeopardy. It is thought by some, or rumored, that the Imperial government will be removed from Pekin to some interior city before the allied tro ps reach Pekin. But the facts about which there have been so many conflicting rumors will soon be known. If the troops are at the gates of Pekin at this writing the mystery and doubt that has kept the nations in suspense so long will be fully known before the close of the present week. The disposition of England to land troops at Shanghai. presumably for the protection of her subjects and interests there, does not seem to be favorably regarded by the powers. Every independent movement of any one of the powers seems to create suspicion and uneasiness lest advantage be taken or in some way secured. It will require great diplomatic skill and statesmanship to adjust matters, after the relief of the ministers, without war. The question of the integrity of the Chinese empire is still paramount.

MR. CAMPBELL ON THE HOLY SPIRIT.

We have no desire or purpose to treat this subject in any controversial spirit. Referring to the introductory statement in Bro. Oldham's last article on the subject as to the distinction between the Word and the truth, and as to Mr. Campbell's perception of that distinction, we will only add that whatever may be true as to the Campbell and Rice Debate, there is abundant proof in Mr. Campbell's writings that he did recognize the distinction in question. And this recognition, we may add, is essential to a true understanding of the doctrine of the Holy Spirit. We can conceive of nothing that would be likely to prove more deadening to true piety than the following out to its logical conclusion of the theory that God's only method of touching and influencing the human spirit is through verbal communications, written or spoken. Happily, many good people who hold this theory are inconsistent with it and thus save their religion at the expense of their theory.

What place is there for prayer, for divine guidance and comfort in times of perplexity and sorrow, under the theory that the only way God can answer our prayer is through the written Word that was given two thousand years ago? The truth is, those who pray effectually realize that they are in direct touch with God, and they expect and receive direct aid from Him. theory or philosophy that would rob struggling and burdened humanity of this belief would be an unspeakable calamity. know of nothing that would cut the nerve of prayer more effectually than the theory that God can communicate help to the human soul only through a written revela-

Perhaps we cannot do better in this connection than to quote from the recent work, "Alexander Campbell's Theology,"* from the chapter entitled "The Work of the Holy Spirit in Conversion and Regeneration." The author of this volume believes that Mr. Campbell in his debate with Mr. Rice was true to his Lockian philosophy, which considered man as "a creature who can be reached only through the intellect (i. e., only by the impartation of ideas), and whose intellect can be reached only through the senses." He says: "Taking into consideration only the statements in the Campbell-Rice Debate, this position is consistently maintained, that the Spirit exerts no influence upon man at any time or in any way except through the agency of the Word. This proposition is sustained by arguments drawn from Locke's philosophy, from which it is shown that the nature of man is such that he can be influenced only through words." Whatever may be true as to this debate-and we have not examined it with sufficient care on this point to affirm or deny the statement-it cannot be maintained that in his later writings Mr. Campbell was always consistent with that philosophv. Quoting again from the abov work, the author says that in Mr. Camp bell's "Christian System" "there are indica tions of the recognition of an influence of the Spirit in sanctification which could no be accounted for on strictly Lockian prin ciples." The following quotation is made from Christian System, p. 284: "All that is done in us before regeneration God our Fathe effects through the Word, or the gospel a dictated and confirmed by His Holy Spirit But after we are thus begotten and born by the Spirit of God-after our new birththe Holy Spirit is shed on us richly through Jesus Christ our Savior; of which the peace of mind, the love, the joy and the hope of the regeneration are full proof; for these are among the fruits of that Holy Spirit of promise of which we speak." The comment by the author on this quotation seems to be entirely just. He says:

There is a recognition of a different kind of in fluence of the Spirit from that which he has previously asserted to be the only possible method consistent with the constitution of the human mind. Before regeneration, he says, the Spirit does its work only through the Word; but after we are born anew the "Holy Spirit is shed on us richly through Jesus Christ our Savior." The latter method, though not closely defined, is clearly distinguished from the influence through the Word. In imm-diate connection with the last passage quoted Mr. Campbell distinguishes between "the bath of regeneration," which is the culmination of the Spirit's activity through the Word, and "the renewing of the Holy Spirit." He continues "But this pouring out of the influences, this renewing of the Holy Spirit, is as necessary as the bath of regeneration to the salvation of the soul and to the enjoyment of the hope of heaven, of which the apostle speaks. In the kingdom into which we are born of water the Holy Spirit is as the atmosphere in the kingdom of nature; we mean that the influences of the Holy Spirit are as necessary to the new life as the atmosphere is to our animal life in the kingdom of nature."

The following additional quotation from Mr. Campbell's writings is further proof of his recognition of the influence of the Spirit apart from the written Word: "It is the duty of Christians to perfect holiness in the fear of the Lord. This requires aid. Hence, assistance is to be prayed for, and it is promised. The Holy Spirit, then, is the author of all our holiness; and in the struggle after victory over sin and temptation it helps our infirmities and comforts us by seasonably bringing to our remembrance the promises of Christ and strengthens us with all might in the inner man." It is evident from these and many similar quotations which could be made that Mr. Campbell held a much deeper and richer view of the Holy Spirit than that which limits His activities to the medium of the Bible When it came to the question of being consistent with his philosophy or being true to his religious experience, Mr. Campbell chose the latter as the author of the work referred to points out in the following pas-

For the theologian who had at his command no other philosophy than this there were two courses open: he might adhere rigidly to the philosophy and issue either in the arid orthodoxy which characterized the latter part of the eighteenth century in England, or in deism, verging constantly toward complete negation; or, he might use the philosophy as far as possible consistently with the requirements of his religious consciousnes, and abandon it when its limitations would force him into undesirable paths. Mr. Campbell chose the latter alternative. It was this desertion of the philosophy which he had used in the greater part of his system that gave Mr. Campbell the right to repudiate what he calls the 'Word-alone" theory as the "parent of a cold, lifeless rationalism and formality." The sensational philosophy logically followed out leads to the Word-alone theory in its boldest and most extreme form (Alexander Campbell's Theology, p. 280).

Of course, the important matter is, not what Mr. Campbell taught on this subject, but what do the Scriptures teach, and on this point we have expressed ourself frequently, but we have deemed it worth while to point out the inadequate representation of Mr. Campbell's views on this subject in justice to him as a theologian and a religious reformer.

hour of Prayer.

THE FORGIVING SPIRIT.

(Matt. 18:21-35; Eph. 4:31-32.)

[Uniform Midweek Prayer mee'ing Topic, Aug. 22.] CENTRAL TRUTH: The forgiving spirit is the Christian spirit, and he that does not forgive cannot be forgiven.

Perhaps there is no severer test of the reality of our Christian character than our method of treating those who mistreat us, and our habit of feeling toward our enemies. The spirit of retaliation and the cherishing of malice toward those who have done us injury seems to be ingrained in our fallen human nature, and nothing but the grace of God can overcome it.

It was no doubt in response to some of Christ's teachings concerning the duty of forgiviness that Peter said: "Lord, how oft shall my brother sin against me and I forgive him? until seven times?" Peter no doubt thought this was a great stretch of charity, and when the Master said: "Until seventy times seven," he must have felt that this was a very difficult requirement to comply with. And ye, Peter learned afterwards that it is not so hard when one has the spirit of Christ—a large, magnanimous, forgiving spirit.

To further enforce the duty of forgiveness, and to show the smallness and meanness of the unforgiving spirit, Jesus spoke a parable concerning a certain king who would make a reckoning with his servants. When one of them who owed him a very large amount was unable to pay it and asked his lord to have patience with him his lord forgave the large debt, but this same servant went out and found one of his fellowservants who owed him a very small amount, and when he was unable to pay it h, treated him very roughly and cast him into prison. When the lord heard what he had done he said to him: "Thou wicked servant! I forgave thee all that debt because thou besought me; shouldst not thou also have had mercy on thy fellowservant, even as I had mercy on thee?" So he was delivered to the tormentors until he should pay all that was due. The lesson drawn from this incident is given by the Saviour thus: "So shall also my Heavenly Father do unto you if ye forgive not every one his brother from your hearts."

The wrongs which our fellowmen have done to us are not to be compared with the wrongs which we have done against God. If He can forgive us, surely, out of appreciation for that mercy which has been shown to us we ought to extend forgiveness to all who have in any way injured us. The fact that forgiving others is made an essential condition of being forgiven by our Saviour, when He said: "If you forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses," shows that there is in that spirit that refuses to forgive an insuperable obstacle to receiving forgiveness. The person who refuses to forgive others is in no moral condition to receive pardon from God. His heart is not right. This is a fact that needs to be pondered well by those who cherish in their hearts an unforgiving spirit toward any of their fellowmen.

The true spirit of Christ is reflected in these words of the apostle: "Let all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamor, and railing be put away from you, with all malice; and be ye kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving each other, even as God also in Christ forgave you." This is the true rule of Christian living in relation to those who have wronged us, and this is the spirit which should be cultivated by every one who would be a Christian in character as well as in name. There is no room in the heart for these ugly passions when once the love of Christ and love of our fellowmen make their entrance. The two kinds of feeling cannot abide together. When one enters the other must leave.

There is nothing, perhaps, in all Christ's life more characteristic of Him and more in harmony with what we feel that a divine Saviour should be than His treatment of His enemies. His ability to rise above the petty feelings of revenge and malice, of retaliation and unforgiveness, and out of His great heart to extend love and kindness to those who had evilly treated Him, and even upon the cross to pray for those who had unjustly condemned Him and crucified Him, is to us one of the highest proofs of His divinity. How can we be His disciples, learning of Him and following Him, unless we partake of that same spirit and do good to those that do evil to us and extend forgivenese to those who have wronged us?

PRAYER.

O God, our Father, we thank Thee for the forgiveness, full and free, which Thou hast extended to us in Christ Jesus our Lord. We thank Thee for a Saviour who loved us even while we were yet enemies and manifested His love by giving His life for us. We beseech Thee, our Father, that this spirit of forgiveness which was in Jesus Christ our Saviour may be also in us, and that we may forgive others even as Thou hast forgiven us. May the realization of the vast debt which Thou hast forgiven us lead us to a like magnanimity toward all those who have trespassed against us. And this we ask in Christ's name. Amen!

Editor's Easy Chair or MACATAWA MUSINGS.

The past week has been one of the fullest and busiest in the history of Macatawa Park. The hotels and cottages all seem to be full to overflowing. The weather has been clear, bright and warmer than is usual for this place. There has been, however, a delightful breeze most of the time, modified by the lake, and in the shade it has not only been tolerable, but even comfortable. The Macatawa Park Assembly closes with a lecture to-night by Prof. Frederick, an artist of the University of Illinois. The lectures by Prof. R. I. Lloyd, of Oakland, Cal., have been exceedingly interesting and instructive. He is a fascinating man, a careful, scholarly and intelligent Bible student, who has the art of communicating what he knows with dramatic power. He never failed to delight and instruct his hearers. He left us this morning, returning to California to his sick wife, followed by the good wishes and prayers of many who have been profited by his teaching here, and who have learned to love him. He is a Welchman by birth, but has been in this country since fourteen years of age. He holds a professorship in the Congregational Theological Seminary at Oakland, and soon to be located at Berkeley, Cal. He belongs to a class of Bible students and teachers, the number of which we hope may increase, who feel it to be their duty to study the Bible reverently, fearlessly, and to report what they find regardless of its bearing on the creeds or traditions of men. On a few points we should no doubt differ with Prof. Lloyd, but we nevertheless admire his ability, his scholarship, his love of the truth, his boldness in declaring his convictions and his manifest loyalty to Christ and his Christian spirit. Macatawa will always be glad to welcome him.

The evening lectures and lecturers were as follsws: On Monday evening C. C. Rowlison, of Indianapolis, was substituted for the lecturer of that evening, who could not be present. His theme was "The Close of the Nineteenth Centure," and the lecture was an able and thoughtful presentation of the progress made along many lines during this wonderful century. On Tuesday evening Frank G. Tyrrell, of Chicago, entertained his audience with a popular lecture entitled "Roses of the Dawn," in which he pointed out some of the signs of promise. The speaker, realizing that his audience did not care for heavy thinking, sought rather to entertain them, stringing his roses together on a chain of anecdotes and incidents. The Wedneseay evening lecture was by Rev. J. C. Cromer, of St. Louis, on the "Present Trend of Theological Thought." The lecturer took the point of view occupied by President William DeWitt Hyde in his book, "God's Education of Man," and gave us an outline of that new type of religious thought, which is the result of evolution and biblical criticism. On Thursday evening Prof. Graham Taylor, of the "Chicago Commons," gave us one of his thoughtful and soulstirring talks on "The New Knight-errantry," consisting of lessons drawn from the lives of Pestalozzi and Froebel. Prof. Taylor is always gladly heard here and he never fails to appeal to the conscience mightily in behalf of more unselfish living. On Friday evening the lecture was by Geo. H. Combs, of Kansas City, on "Some Types of Women in Latter-day Fiction." It was artistic, discriminating, humorous, pathetic, dramatic fascinating. As already stated, the closing lecture will take place this evening by Prof. F. F. Frederick on "Municipal Art with Suggestions for a more Artistic Macatawa." On the whole we feel that it has been a profitable week for those who have attended these lectures, and the Macatawa Assembly may be considered one of the established institutions of the country.

One of the pleasant incidents of the week was the reception given by Prof. Graham Taylor and wife at their new cottage to Prof. Lloyd, to which all the ministers of the Park and their wives were invited. There were probably present from twentyfive to thirty preachers, most of whom had their wives with them, but others of whom had left them behind, and still others, alas! who had none to bring. It was a pleasant, bright and intellectual gathering, which all thoroughly enjoyed. Prof. and Mrs. Taylor have learned the art of making their guests feel at home and at their best. Even the ice cream which was served did not seem to throw any coldness over the spirits of the assembled guests, and the conversation ranged all the way from theology and politics to the smallest talk on local happenings. There is a very close, homelike feeling prevailing among the sojourners here at the Park, at least among those who attend religious services and help to keep up the religious life of the place. During the moonlight nights which have prevailed the past week the bathers have given the lake no rest until a late hour of the night, but their merry laugh and shout are heard along the beach as they plunge in the moonlit breakers for a cooling bath before retiring. The higher temperature than usual which we have had has made it a great week for bathing, and many new beginners have mastered the art of swimming. For us it has been a very busy week, as indeed most of the weeks are. Said a well-known brother to us this week: "You are not getting near so much vacation out of this as most of your readers imagine." Very true, no doubt. We have had no vacation for many years. We try to give our readers a little vacation, however, by our change to this place.

As we write a scene is being enacted on the lake in front of our cottage which would make a fine picture for the canvas. A dozen sailboats are maneuvering for positions in a race which is pending. A strong south wind is blowing and the blue surface of the lake is flecked with whitecaps. The end of the pier at the mouth of the channel is crowded with spectators. Steam launches and other crafts have carried many others out on the lake to witness the race. Now they are lined up for the contest and the race is on. They are sailing now apparently with a beam wind, but even a head wind would be better than no wind for sailing vessels, and besides it is equally fair to all. There is the same wind for all. and it is a question of skill, first in the construction of the vessel, and second in managing it. Is it not so in our life race? How different the use made by different men of the same opportunities and advantages! Out of them one wins success and fame, another defeat and shame. But all men in life do not have the same opportunities for success. This, perhaps, cannot be. And yet, it would seem to be the highest aim of all governments and institutions among men to give to all, as far as government can do so, an equal chance in the race of life. But the boat race-the vessels are now standing far out on the lake with their bellied sails indicating a good rate of speed. and the allignment preserved shows that it is a close contest, and it will take the return trip to decide which is to be the winner. Nor well it be until our life barges are anchored in the everlasting haven that it can be said of us: "Life's race well run."

The cut on our first page this week presents one of the many good views of Macatawa Park. The point of view is the margin of Black Lake, or Macatawa Bay, just south of the Macatawa dock where the Chicago boats land and from which they leave. This dock is seen with its pavilion to the left in front part of picture, with the foot of Bald Knob just protruding farther on. To the right of the picture is Ottawa Beach and the hotel on that side, together with the sandhills. In the center of the picture is the channel which connects Macatawa Bay with Lake Michigan, while the latter is seen in the distance, stretching out toward the west where we witness so many golden sunsets. This will give our readers a very good idea of the view on that side of the Park. Later we may present a view of the Lake Michigan side, which will give a better idea of the Park itself. But no picture can do justice to this place. Last night as the "Soo City" sailed out across Macatawa Bay, lit up by the full moon just rising above the trees, and out through the channel, bearing among others Bro. and Sister Moore and Bro. Tyrrell and family across the silver sea, the beauty of the scene surpassed the power of camera, brush or pen. It must be seen and felt.

Edgewood-on-the-Lake, Aug. 11.

The weather during the past two weeks has greatly added to the population of summer retreats. All the cities throughout the country have suffered and in the larger cities a number of fatalities from the heat have been reported. But the weather prophets predict cooler weather for us for the present week, at least, and we shall hope that they will not prove false prophets.

Questions and Hnswers.

What has the Woman's Christian Board of Missions done in the work of establishing Bible Chairs in state universities?

Maroa, Ill. C. C. Redgrave.

The board mentioned has established a Bible Chair at Ann Arbor, now occupied by Professor Coler, which has considerable endowment. It has also in connection with the university the co-operation of brethren in Virginia established Bible teaching in connection with the University of Virginia at Charlottesville. This also has several thousand dollars endowment. In addition to these there have been Bible lectures delivered at the University of Georgia under the auspices of the C. W. B. M., but no permanent endowment, we believe, has been yet raised for this work. Brother C. A. Young has done most of the work in connection with the two last-named universities. Bible instruction has also been established in connection with the University of Missonri, at Columbia, the University of California, at Berkeley, and the University of Oregon at Salem. The work in connection with these three institutions, however, is not under the auspices of the C. W. B. M., but has no doubt been quickened by the success attending the effor:s of our Christian women in the same direction.

What is meant by the phrase used by our scribes:" A test of fellowship?"

John A. Duff.

The term "fellowship" in the New Testament means partnership, or a common participation with others in the blessings, duties and responsibilities of Christian service. In the phrase referred to the meaning is that a certain practice or belief is made a test of membership in the church. It is generally held among us as reformers that only those things should be made a test of fellowship which Jesus Christ has made a condition of salvation. When something else is required by men in addition to this it is said that they are erecting a new test of fellowship, If, for instance, we should require candidates for baptism to hold a certain theory of the atonement, or of the operation of the Holy Spirit, or the design of baptism, as a condition of membership in the church, in addition to a penitent faith and a willingness to obey Christ, we should be erecting an unauthorized test of fellowship. That this has been done in the history of the church very largely is shown by the numerous sects into which the church has been divided.

What is the best definition of a Christian?

We do not know of a better one than that given by Alexander Campbell, namely, a Christian is one who believes in Christ and who obeys Him to the extent of the knowledge of His will. We do not have the exact words of his answer before us, but that is substantially his definition. In other words we would say a Christian is one who has the spirit of Christ and who is seeking to do Christ's will in all things.

THE SPIRITUAL SIDE OF OUR PLEA.

Righteousness and Law.

A. B. JONES.

There is probably no word in the Bible more conspicuous, or more important, or more conspicuously important than the word righteousness. Righteousness in religion, like justice in law, is a fundamental idea. Human government is formed around the conception of justice. In all their diversities and ramifications, seeking to adjust themselves to the conditions and the wants of men, human laws, whether constitutional or statutory, evince evermore the one great purpose of attaining the ends of justice among the people. So the chief end of all divine government, of all divine legislation, is the attainment of righteousness in men and among men. As applied to persons the term righteousness is indicative of a moral state and of moral character. A righteous man and an unrighteous man are not in the same moral state, nor of the same moral character. In these respects they are radically different. And yet, men's ideas of righteousness differ, and in some instances are very superficial, falling far short of the scriptural conception of this subject. These differences call for some such classification as the following:

- 1. The righteousness of custom.
- 2. The righteousness of law.
- 3. The righteousness of good intention.
- 4. The righteousness of Christ imputed.
 - . The righteousness of faith.

Let us consider each of these briefly in the order named.

1. The righteousness of custom.

A repetition of the same act or the same course of life forms a custom and creates a tendency in that direction, both with individuals and with society. What is customary? This with some people is the supreme question. The authority of custom is final with many. In matters of mere expediency or casuistry a deference for custom may be regarded as wise and legitimate, but where moral and religious principles are involved the conscientious man appeals to a higher court than the customs of society. And there is perhaps no better test of genuine Christian manhood than the ability to disregard and ignore the customs that have been formed and have grown into a sort of unwritten law in a vitiated social community. The tendency to run in grooves, to be in the fashion, to be like other people, is a most dangerous and besetting influence. It was to list the world above this paltry notion of things that God placed before men the life of Christ. In the Sermon on the Mount we have a remarkable example of the courage which defies popular sentiment that had crystallized into cus om. From beginning to end it is an earnest protest against the idea of mere routine living, of mere popularized duty, and an earnest effort to clear away the accumulated rubbish of customs that he might purge the conscience and establish a nobler standard of righteousness. To this end the Savior repeated, over and over again: "Ye have heard that it was said." And then rising above all traditions he adds, in an authoritative way: "But I say unto you." With this introduction his hearers are led into profounder views of thinking, of feeling and of living.

Except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven." What a bold, revolutionary declaration! "There came to Jesus from Jerusalem Paraisees and scribes, saying, Why do thy disciples transgress the tradition of the elders? for they wash not their hands when they eat bread. And he answered and said unto them, Why do ye also transgress the commandment of God because of your tradition?" And the world is full enough of just such people to-daypeople who never look beneath the surface of things to determine their character by the sound principles of morality or religion; but who follow custom and tradition, even to the extent of violating the most fundamental laws of righteous living. One example here will be enough to fix the lesson in the mind of the reader, and suggests many others of the same sort.

"And there came unto him Pharisees, trying him and saying, Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife for every cause? And he answered and said, Have ye not read that he who made them from the beginning made them male and female and said, For this cause shall a man leave father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife; and the twain shall become one flesh? So that they are no more twain, but one flesh. What, therefore, God hath joined together, let not man put asunder. They say unto him, Why, then, did Moses command to give a bill of divorcement, and to put her away? He saith unto them, Moses for your hardness of heart suffered you to put away your wives, but from the beginning it hath not been so. And I say unto you, Whosoever shall put away his wife, except for fornication and shall marry another committeth adultery; and he that marrieth her when she is put away committeth adultery" (Matt. 19:3-9).

Commenting on this divine law of marriage the Apostle Paul, in 1 Cor. 7:10, says: "But unto the married I give charge, yea, not I, but the Lord, that the wife depart not from her husband (but and if she depart, let her remain unmarried or else be reconciled to her husband); and that the husband leave not his wife." There could be nothing plainer or more emphatic written on the subject. And yet, how many members of the church to day are living in open violation of this divine law! And how many church officials wink at it; and how many preachers make themselves particeps criminis by solemnizing the rites of marriage in such cases-all condoned beccause the law of the state and the custom of a vitiated society tolerate it-true Christian manhood sacrificed on the altar of custom, a custom, too, directly in contravention of divine authority concerning the most sacred and important institution pertaining to man's social nature and life!

The difficulty with which men abandon an old custom, simply because it is a custom, and the facility with which they adopt a new custom, simply because it is a custom of others, is a striking illustration of the force and authority with which this form of righteousness asserts itself over our lives. Any change proposed in the established forms of the worship, or of the transaction of business, or the government of our churches, is usually met with a protest: "It is contrary to our custom," which is considered by many as a most potent argument rgainst it. Whether the new method proposed is more efficient, more competent and consequently better, is wholly lost sight of in the clamor of righteous indignation at the bare thought of surrendering "the custom of this church;" and we might add, of the imaginary "righteousness" therein. First-class church rows, alienation of old friends, resignation of pastors, etc., are some of the fragrant fruits that grow on this tree of "righteousness." And especially if the custom obtained "in Jerusalem," or among "the apostles" and 'primitive disciples," although without divine appointment, is it held to tenaciously by traditionalists and made the battle ground for the adventurous, progressive iconoclast. Hence, the pros and cons of "feetwashing," the "holy kiss," the "silence of women in the church," polygamy, slavery, etc.

There must be something more in favor of any custom than the mere fact that "it is our custom," or "it was the custom of the primitive Christians" before it can be held as authoritative or necessary in personal or congregational faith and life. And there must be something more against any proposed practice than the mere fact that "it is not our custom," or "it was not the custom of the primitive disciples" before it can be held as unauthorized or unnecessary in personal or congregational faith or life. The customs of one people or one age do not always suit another people or another age and cannot, therefore, conduce to their spiritual welfare. And that Christian liberty provided for in the great general principles of the New Testament authorize and even make necessary, in some cases, the discarding of old customs and the adop tion of new.

On the other hand, how easily and gracefully professing Christians sometimes yield to the seductive influences abroad in fashionable society and fall in with the pernicious, irreligious customs of their day and generation; as, for example, those of dancing, card-playing, horse racing, etc. Not perhaps at first positively commiting adultery with the lewed dance, card gambling and horse-betting; but only coy with their younger sisters, the "parlor dance" at the elder's home, the "social game of high five," or progressive euchre" at the county fair; while the weakling preacher shuts one eye that he may not see it and winks encouragement with the o'her. "Ye adulterers and adulteresses, know ye not that the friendship of the world is enmity with God? Whosoever, therefore, will be a friend of the world is the enemy of God" (James 4:4).

A NOBLE LIFE WORK-PROF. W. H. GREEN.

GEO. T. SMITH.

A scholar's good name is part of his reward. A review of Dr. Green's work in the Christian-Evangelist unwittingly detracted most unmercifully from his deserved reputation. It was the omission of facts unknown to the able reviewer which caused the wrong picture to be drawn. There is no man who would be more pained at the thought of doing injury to another than the author of the review, so we feel that we have his concurrence in the attempt to set forth the facts.

Pres. McCosh said that the statement of a partially told incident in a man's life may be the deepest calumny. H. Clay Trumbull and Tennyson go yet further in denouncing half truths as the worst misrepresentation.

The review placed Dr. Green in Princeton immediately after graduation, omitting all reference to his long pastorate in the Central Presbyterian Church, of Philadelphia. He was called to Princeton in 1851, not 1842. He was represented as teaching He brew in books "which have been superseded by much more usable volumes, pursuing the inductive method." Dr. Green had not taught Hebrew for twenty-seven years. He had also taught Sanskrit, Aramic and Arabic in his teaching days. His Hebrew Grammar so far from being superseded reached its fifth edition in 1898. Dr. Green revolutionized the method of teaching Hebrew. Most of his progressive views have been incorporated by the editors of Gesenius, though he is yet in advance. As to the inductive method, while it is imperative in scientific investigation, in teaching languages other methods are as efficacious. "Many American teachers use it, many others do not. It is not employed in Europe."

The Bible Student and the Biblical World (June) contains appreciative reviews of Dr. Green's work as a scholar.

The review counted his having been moderator of the Presbyterian Assembly as his highest honor. But he was chairman of the Old Testament committee on revision, the highest honor awarded to American scholarship in any generation. He did twelve years' work in that line. Often this progressive and far-seeing scholar was voted down by the two-thirds rule, the majority being more conservative.

Entirely overlooked by the review, he received honors from the universities of Harvard, Edinburgh, Brieslau, Giessen, Griefswald, Zurich and Alexandria. Do the universities of America, Scotland, Germany, Switzerland and Finland pick out an antiquated fossil who is teaching Hebrew by a method long ago superseded, who denies the value and legitimacy of investigations into any subject? What other name has been thus honored?

In higher criticism Dr. Green has done his best work. He did not touch some lines of argument advanced by men who hold that the Bible history is credible, but the linguistic argument especially received the fullest treatment at his hands. The scientific argument, by Howard Crosby; the archæological, by Ira M. Price, of the University of Chicago; the psychological, by A. C. Zenos and J. W. Mendenhall; the theological, by E. C. Bissell; the ethical and religious, by T. W. Chambers, are among the arguments which Dr. Green did not treat to any extent. Some he did not touch. In the historical, S. C. Bartlett and J. W. Mac-Dill have carried the contention much farther than Dr. Green, and in the linguistic C. M. Mead has applied the methods adopted by the small school which Dr. Green opposed to Romans with the result that he proved mathematically that if there are several writers of the Pentateuch there are four of Romans. These men are all Americans, all except one or two professors in theological seminaries, all living except one. From this the reader can see how unjust is the isolation awarded to Dr. Green, how unfair to other scholars the assertions of the review that Dr. Green presented all the arguments on the conservative side that have appeared in American journalism, and that he is almost the last of his type of conservative scholars and that his views of the Scriptures have passed away. That assertion was hasty. To say of any scholar that his views of any subject have passed away is cruel. Dr. Green gave his life to the study and defense of the Bible. A scholarly statement would be, some views of Dr. Green have passed away. True. Predestination, for example. The reviewer doubtless intended no such meaning, but he did not improve a later opportunity to correct a hasty expression. On the contrary he made it stronger. The divorce from the facts is yet more lamentable. We feel sure that the esteemed writer, who never speaks but to charm, never writes but to fascinate and to instruct, will recognize the gross injustice done to a fellowscholar, albeit an aged man, now tongueless. J. D. Davis, professor of Semitic Languages in Princeton, can better interpret Dr. Green than we, who are removed from him in distance and perhaps in sympathy. He says: "Dr. Green valued criticism. He discerned in thorough and unfaltering investigation a handmaid of truth. He took issue with Dillman on many minor points and on fundamental principles; but he was amazed if one could not discern the immense worth of the comments and criticisms of the great exegete of Berlin. He recommended the commentaries of Franz Delitzsch, whose picture was on his table. . . . His rich library was not devoted to the literature of his own side of the question. It comprehended the works of every Old Testament scholar of repute. He turned on the full light when engaged in research, and when he spoke it was out of a complete knowledge in all its respects." How completely the reviewer misunder-

How completely the reviewer misunderstood Dr. Green may be seen when we see his description of the conservative type which has passed away. In reality it never existed. Such a numbskull as the following could not rise higher than janitor in any college:

"By that type is meant the scholars who reject totally the results of higher criticism, regarding, for example, the documentary character of the Hexateuch, the importance of the exilic and post-exilic periods in the religious and literary life of Israel and the value and legitimacy of those investigations of authorship and date which have illuminated many obscure parts of the Old Testament." Reader, before you and I were in the cradle (unless you are a sexagenarian) Dr. Green was a higher critic. Its accredited results he accepted to the day of his death. He contributed largely to higher criticism. No scholar ever denied that the Hexateuch is built of two docuuments. He certainly favored investigation. Not one result of higher criticism did he ever deny if we may define result as that accepted generally by scholars.

When Dr. Green was a boy Eichhorn's theory as to the Pentateuch had "swept all Germany, meeting with but little oppositlon." Its advocates complacently claimed all scholarship for it. Eichhorn predicted that in twenty years all opposition would cease. It is deader than Adam. A few battered planks were saved which entered into other theories which also denied that Moses wrote the Pentateuch. These, numbers of them, were the fad of the day, and are wrecks on the shores of theology. The present theory which denies the truthfulness of the record which the Bible gives of the origin of its early books Dr. Green helped to lay out in its little coffin.

The mistake of the courteous reviewer is in identifying a view held by a few with higher criticism. In that connection it would not be possible to quote from Dr. Green's works a view he held of the Scripture which has passed away. To say that he passed over arguments which seem insuperable to most Bible students does a great scholar injustice. He passed over arguments only to crush them. There are but four in a generous count. To most Bible students they do not seem insuperable, for ninety-nine per cent. of Bible students, even in educated classes, hold with Dr. Green that the Pentateuch was not written by P1, P2, P3, P4, P5 and seven basketfuls of other fragments, but that "Moses wrote this law, all its words in a book till they were finished and gave to the Levites."

Dr. Green did loyal service for the King in higher criticism, and his work will stand long after the decadent theories of men who were avowed foes to revelation shall have passed away.

Says Dr. Davis: "He viewed the question, not simply in those features which present themselves to an exclusive higher criticism, but in its yet wider bearings. He knew not only the possible solutions which suggest themselves to the higher critic, but also to the choice between possible solutions when they are subjected to further examination in the light furnished by related departments of biblical research, textual criticism, exegesis, archæology, the backward and forward gaze of prophecy, the general trustworthiness of the Scriptures and the attitude of Christ. . . . His conclusions accordingly concatenante with a great sys-em of well-ascertained truths . . . a nan of depth and breadth and proportion withal."

Is there not here a lesson? Have not our thoughts become partisan and fearful? Do we not identify our views, perhaps narcow, with the truth of God, and shrink from definite affirmation and the arena lest the Word of God be brought into disrepute? Had we space we could show that this great scholar, possibly two large for our footule, did not hold his views to be identical with Scripture, so that if his theory were overthrown, the foundations would be destroyed. Let men think. Let them speak. Dread no light. Hamper expression and you rep I brainy men. Let us be broad and let us love one another, however strongly we may combat error.

CHRIST.

BEN GREENSTEIN.

Times change conditions. Men change opinions. The idea of to-day is altered or lost in the greater idea of to-morrow. Time bestows maturity, imparts ripeness, makes perfect, gives development to great ideas. There is a continuous psychical evolution. The fittest idea is the surviving idea. The truest idea is the most enduring idea. The noblest idea is the eternal idea. The change is not in the subject, but in the predicate. That which is spoken of is fixed and immutable; that which speaks is transitory and mutable; immutability is not the law of human thought, because of its vast labyrinth of complexity; complexity implies combination; combination implies liability to dissolution. But the subject of our thoughts, and especially our present subject, is unchangeable because of absolute simplicity and unity.

To put it in a more concrete form, we would say that Christ is absolutely the same througout time and eternity because of the incarnate perfection of divine simplicity, but we are changeable because of mortal fragility and human complexity, which is constantly changing and dissolving. Our conceptions change. The conception itself does not change. The Christian religion is ever changing; Christ is never changing. Why? Because one is complex and the other is simple. Our conception of Christ is differand better than the conception the disciples and early church fathers had. There is a constant evolution in the theological world of the Christological conception. The evolution is in ourselves and not in the subject. Theology is becoming absorbed in a Christology. The greatest argument for the existence of God is not the teleological or the cosmological, but it is the Christological argument. The Christic idea rules where once the theistic idea reigned. Concrete example is rapidly displacing abstract thought. We do not try to prove the existence of God now, as was done in the medieval theology, by abstract philosophy, but we demonstrate the existence of God by concrete biography. The tendency of modern times is the greatest production of Christic literature. Christ never was so real as he is in the 20th century. The idea which is taking a firm and tenacious grasp on the religious intellect is the reality of the historicity of Jesus of the past, and the practical relationship of Christ of the present. Religion contemplates Christ; philosophy studies Christ; science learns Christ; art feels Christ; music articulates Christ. He is the center of religious and social gravitation. Civilization is his work; morality is his precepts; religion is his practice. Christ, Christ, Christ, everywhere, everywhere-in the home; in business; in labor; in society; in church; in state. Oh, the tremendous reality of the omnipresence of Christ in all our progress and achievements!

Christianity is Christ abstracted; Christ is Christianity concreted. He is perfection anatomized; religion incarnated; ethics humanized. His personality does not only reign in Christianity, but is identical with Christianity. His is not the personality of a religion, but is the religion of a personality. His influence in modern affairs is dynamical. History is the record of Christ's influence among men; Christ lives in a genuinely real sense; potentates bow at his feet; kingdoms delight to do him honor; society worships him; literature reflects him. This is the Christ of the New Testament-a living Christ. He sweetens life, elevates mind, adjusts worries, soothes sorrows, purifies enjoyments. He inspires the young, enthuses the strong and comforts the aged. No domestic economy is complete without him. Political economy is vain without him. Take Christ into your confidence now and forever.

THE PULPIT IN POLITICS.

W. W. HOPKINS.

God's will contemplates the regeneration of man, the regeneration of society, the regeneration of business and the regeneration of governments. The regeneration of man is the beginning, not the end of the work. To stop here is to fail.

The nature of man and the constitution of society are such that a Christian must seek to purify his surroundings or become an ascetic. There is no other way. The law of self-preservation demands that a Christian character have Christian environment.

A church whose members are in daily contact with unrighteousness in society, in business and in politics can no more keep out the worldly, mercenary, selfish spirit than it can fly. The commingling of any community is bound to equalize its morals To preserve a high moral standard in the church the church must purify its surroundings.

Society must be regenerated. It is as wise to talk about raising a family in the slums of a city and keep it pure as to talk about keeping the Christian spirit in a church whose members live harmoniously with unregenerated society. It can't be done. Society must be regenerated or the church must fail—must be swallowed up. Besides, unrighteousness in society is as repugnant to God as unrighteousness in the church

Business must be regenerated. All business should be founded upon righteousness -upon the golden rule. Members of the church can no more live without business than without society. A man that will not provide for his household is worse than an infidel. And yet, if he engages in a business that is demoralizing it will demoralize his character—destroy his Christianity. The business of the country to-day is honeycombed with the gambling spirit and with gambling methods. The aim of men to day is to get, not make money. Even large business enterprises are neither founded nor conducted on Christian principles. There is not a proper distribution of profits, etc. We can never approximate a true Christian church until we have in some measure Christianized the society and business of which its members are components.

Upon the same basis governments must be regenerated. Corrupt governments are a hindrance to the church and an abomination before God. The kingdoms of this world can never become the kingdom of Christ until wickedness is eliminated, oppression crushed out, unjust laws repealed and corruption in officials made next to an impossibility. A church that refuses to work for better governments is not fulfilling its divine mission; it is committing suicide.

The first Christians supposed their work done with the conversion of men. They did not trouble themselves about corrupt society, corrupt business and corrupt governments, and the result was they had to get out of this world; live in the dens and caves of the earth; become ascetics. Monastic orders soon began to flourish. It could not be otherwise. They kept society, business and politics out of the church, and in turn were kept out of society, business and politics. Those who preach that doctrine today ought to turn their churches and cathed. rals into monasteries. Either do this or throw away the doctrine and try to make the world better.

It will not do to stop at conversion. God will not do the rest. We must get out into society and business and politics with the gospel of Jesus Christ and work for their regeneration. It is time preachers were studying up a little on these lines. The devil never wielded a more successful club against the church than this divorcem nt doctrine between the church and business, politics and society. With it he has set the kingdom of heaven back a thousand years. No, brethren, we must get out of this rut and preach righteousness, temperance and godliness in the world until rulers tremble. Remaining Addresses at Alexander Procter's Funeral

And Other Tributes To His Memory

ADDRESS OF T. P. HALEY. MY BELOVED BRETHREN, FRIENDS AND NEIGHBORS:-I feel utterly unfitted for the duty assigned me, and I am here only at the request, the command, I might say, of my kinsman and my brother, whose body lies here. Of course, I can add nothing to the beautiful tribute which has been paid him by one whom he loved so well; but I have thought perhaps his neighbors might be interested in listening to one who has known him all his life, to some of the incidents of his life with which I am familiar. Some one has said that it took seven generations of great men to produce an Emerson, and Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes said a man's training should begin a century before he is born. We are all familiar with the influence of heredity and realize that among the things which go to make up human character nothing has a greater influence than one's heredity except environment. Our brother came of a magnificent race of men and women. I knew his father and his kindred, I might say from the time I opened my eyes to the light of day. It is fitting for me this afternoon to say in the presence of this large audience: No man was ever better born than he. His father was known throughout the country in which he lived as a man of fine common sense, of sterling integrity, of untiring industry, a man just to every man with whom he came in contact. I recall an incident that occurred in my boyhood when I had gone from home to college and had returned home after a year's absence. I met my father, who said: "You will be sorry to learn of the failure of our cousin," mentioning his name. I expressed my regret. He went on to say: "In the judgment of every man in the neighborhood and of every man in the county who know the circumstances, his character shines brighter than in the day of his prosperity." He had been a prosperous man. I take it, my beloved, that not only in that time, but now, any man who can go through a great financial reverse and surrender the accumulation of years, have his friends and his creditors all join in saying that "his character shines brighter in this hour of trial than in the day of prosperity," has achieved a victory of which any man may be proud. His mother was a very remarkable woman. His father was of English descent and his mother belonged to that stalwart race, the Scotch people, a tall, stately queen among women. His father came to this new country, and I cannot remember in all the early years of my life and of my association with the family of ever being met by his mother without a smile, cordial greeting and genial word. Her brothers were remarkable men; I think not one less than six feet in height and some six and one-halfgreat brawny men of tremendous physical force. Such were his ancestors, kinspeople, and you are not surprised that he stood a man among men. I remember the homestead where he lived-great forest trees stood all around. His father was accustomed to gather his children around him and read to them or to lead them through these great forests or to teach them how to follow the plow. My father came West first and settled in this new country, and in a year or two his|father came, and they settled in sight of each other. They had been members of the Baptist Church. The first Christian Church in our part of Missouri was organized in my father's house, and when the organization was completed his father and my father were appointed elders and walked side by side forty years or more and died in the office given them in early manhood. His father had a large family as well as my own; if I am not mistaken, ten or twelve brothers and sisters, and nearly as many in my own home. Although there were very few people in that new country we did not feel the necessity of other neighbors, so close together were we, and each filled up so completely the wants of the other that we did not feel that we were in a strange country. I remember how, when he grew to be nearly a man, the neighbors all talked about him. The old men taught military science on the muster ground to the young men in the neighborhood and regular military drills were held, and this man, whose body lies here, not more than seventeen years of age, was called to be captain of his company, recognized even then as a leader. The old men said he would make his mark in the world -they did not know how. There was that in him to make him the biggest ir all as semblies and a leader among men. I recall the country school and country school teachers, the faces of the boys and girls who sat on the slat benches, and when I have sometimes called their names they have answered from the halls of Congress, sometimes they have answered from the judges bench, from the halls of the State Legislature, from the chair of the president of colleges, they have answered from the pulpits, and they come trooping to me to-day in memory as I stand in the sacred presence of the departed, but among all there were none more bonored than was he for whom we speak this afternoon. At about the age of seventeen, I think, he left our neighborhood. It was a wonderful thing in those days for a toy to go away to school. And by the way, I want to say for the sake of young men who are here that there were not so many books in the country then as there are in the private libraries of some gentlemen of Independence to-day. Young, with a thirst for knowledge, brave, this young man, fresh from the harvest field, left his father's house and neighborhood for the town of Paris, Ill., to study what could not be taught at home. While he was at Paris Mr. Campbell made the announcement that from the proceeds of the hymn books sold in Missouri he would give to any young man selected for the ministry an education at Bethany. A committee was appointed, and they having heard of his thirst for knowledge, when they met in Jefferson City selected Alexander Procter. The committee was composed of T. M. Allen. Jacob Creath and H. Thomas. I remember so well the result: Alexander Procter was chosen by these preachers, and away he went to Bethany College to sit under the voice and instructions of this great man of God. We did not see him for three years or more. We had never had a young man to return from college with a diploma, and as far as I remember no lawyer, doctor nor preacher in our county held a diploma. It was announced that the Sunday after his return he would preach in the city of Huntsville. You might have seen from the dawn of morning on most any road young men riding horseback, men and their wives in wagons-for buggies and carriages were well nigh unknown in Missouri-going to see this boy returned from college-a preacher with a diploma. He went away a stalwart man except for the remarkable recline of the head that you all remember so well. I remember upon entering the church I looked in the pulpit and did not see him; at last my eye fell on a young man sitting in the front of the pulpit, tall, pale and almost as white as a sheet, and I made out with difficulty that this was what remained of that stalwart man that we had sent from the fields to Bethany. He had accomplished what few accomplish. He was gone three years and had completed the curriculum. He had no vacation. It was a very remarkable scene that day when men and women from the fields and farms who had known him in other days hesitated and were afraid to address this scholary boy until he first approached them. They also looked up to him on account of the affection they felt for his father and sweet mother. He hurried away from that appointment to Lexington, Mo. In a little while he was appointed or selected as preacher in Lexington, Mo. Wherever he went we all rejoiced in his promotion. I tell you, in those days the preacher was not what the preacher of to-day is. We were all taught in those early days to look up to the man of God, and to say naught against God's anointed, and that fact clothed this young man with power. At Lexington, Glasgow and then to St Louis, and wherever he went, he was greeted with crowded houses and with honor. I want to say for the benefit of any young preacher here to-day or to the boys who will preach because Bro. Procter was a preacher: No man - ver hinted or intimated that there was a single indiscretion in his life. I was very intimate with him in my young manhood. Oh, how I recall those days and years this afternoon! He stood with me and my wife at the altar in my early manhood. We had many a walk together amony the forest trees and told each other our inmost thoughts and ambitions, and sacred were the confidences of one another. Never were Jonathan and David more attached than were we. He came to your congregation in 1857; I need say nothing of his life since then. There are one or two things I want to say: In his early ministry he never sought any salary. He always asked: "Do you need me, and can I be of service to you?" These were the questions he asked and left the question of salary to those who employed him. He never enjoyed a salary adequate to his ability, I think I may say to you Independence people. No man has ever heard him say: "I must have so much this year or I must move." No man ever heard him say: "I must resign because my salary has not been paid this year." No man in this broad state of Missouri ever heard him complain of poverty. I remember what a man in very moderate circumstances said to me. I never tell my children I am poor when my little ones come into my presence and say: "Papa, I am so thankful we are not poor like some people." No man ever heard him tell of any loss he ever had financially. No man at the time 'he rendered up his account to God held an unreceipted bill against him.

Bro. Procter and I have not always agreed in the way we saw the Bible or in our interpretation of the Scriptures. I want to give the following as an illustration: We had been attending convention; he and that splendid friend of his, G. W. Longan, one of the "noblest Romans of them all," stood on the platform; we had a discussion on the question of beliefs and interpretations; the controversy grew sharp and words flew quickly, until finally I was interrupted by Bro. Longan. I said: "I want you and Procter to know that though I differ from you I love you still; I cannot go as fast as you." He said: "You go fast enough. You go as fast as your convictions go." We sometimes got into sharp discussions, yet there was never an interruption of that affection borne for each other to the very end of his life. A few weeks ago, just a few days before I left for my vacation, I went to see him. He sat in the yard. He said: "When I am gone I want you to say some things to the people about me; you have known me better than anybody else in the world and I believe you understand me better." And I promised him in the shade of those great trees and in the presence of God, if utterance was given me I should bear testimony to his fidelity in every relation of his life and to the purity of his character. I never knew a man come down to his death more serenely. A traveling evangelist came into his yard and said: "Are you going to heaven?" "No," he said, "I am not going anywhere." He said: "Don't you want to go to heaven?" He said: "I am in heaven to-day; where God is heaven is, and here under these trees God is with me. Every day I am in heaven." I do not think he felt like he was going anywhere-felt like he was going to sleep, that is all. Today while you weep he rejoices. I thought last night as I lay awake what a great meeting it was when he whose body lies before us, his friends, Lard and Longan and a host of others whose names I cannot recall met. When dear Bro. Jones and myself and Bro. Berry shall go over, there will not be one of the men left in the broad state of Missouri that were here when he and I and they began our ministry. I am not weeping about it, not at all. Sometimes, in the silent watches of the night, I am saying: "How long, oh Lord, how long?" And I think I can hear him say: "In a little while, only a little while, and you shall be at rest."

The last time I saw this man of God I rode by his home that he loved so well out here, and he was reclining in his great chair; he never looked to me so large or so splendid. I thought of him as a great athelete, who had been in a great contest, a great battle, just waiting to be crowned, waiting for the wreath to be placed on his brow. This life among you has been a benediction to you. We do not know the value of the life that is lived aright until it is gone. The reason why the crown will not be placed on his brow to-day is because God will wait until the influence of his life has been exerted upon the last man, then he will know how to crown him and give to him the glory that belongs to the faithful child. Then we shall see him crowned; and they that have turned many to righteousness shall shine as the stars forever and

ADDRESS OF DR. MADERIA, in Behalf the Ministers' Alliance.

My Friends:—I have been asked to say something in behalf of the Ministers' Alliance of this city and in harmony with a series of resolutions that they have passed.

It is a pleasure for me to say that during more than 35 years of my own ministry I have in no place where I have been met with so perfect a fellowship, yea, of brotherhood, among the various denominations that I have found in Independence. It is with added pleasure that I can say that the success of the Ministers' Alliance has been largely attributed to the instrumentality of our brother whose cold form lies in our midst here to-day. I can say in behalf of his brother ministers that no hearts will feel his loss more genuinely or more sincerely than those of his brother ministers who have been associated with him so pleasantly in the work of the ministry. They have come to know the beauty of his character, and have come to know with something like its worth his fidelity as a minister of Christ. And so in a body they pay tribute to his memory to day. I speak now from the standpoint of interpreting for my brethren of the Alliance and speak on my own behalf. They realize that a great man, indeed, has fallen among us. He was not an ambitious man. If his ambition had been at all equal to his ability there would have been few names written higher in the world of religious history in all the West than that of Alexander Procter. He was not merely a man of scholastic learning, as has been stated here to-day, but a man of wide and varied reading; a man of discriminating mind, having the power of grasping facts, and like such minds, always read between the lines; a suggestion or good thought he appropriated and made the theme his own. Conversing with him often, as I did, I have no remembrance of a topic of conversation being suggested with which he did not seem to be most familiarly acquainted; topic after topic would be touched upon and it seemed as though he had made each one of them a specialty. As a preacher perhaps it would not have been said that he was an eloquent man, and yet, brethren, I never saw him lose his hold upon the attention of a cogregation. He would not have caught them up to the clouds by the fervor or vehemency of his speech, or by the splendor of his rhetoric, or have overwhelmed them by the power of logical reasoning; but there was always just that rich, beautiful and delightful stream of thought proceeding from his mind. It was a spell that was never broken. We can say something better of him than that he was a great man; he was a whole-souled, good man.

There are tho e who, as I can say, and as Bro. Haley has said, differed with him in his theological views. I often found that I was not in harmony altogether with his theological views and many of his interpretations of the Scripture. But no man that knew Alexander Procter and knew him well could have said aught but that his character and life were superlatively beautiful and Christlike. I have never met with a man, in the pulpit or out of it, who dwelt so constantly upon the infinite love of the infinite Father as the man in whose memory I speak this afternoon. He loved everybody. I never heard him preach a sermon that was not the gospel of love. His heart was kind and good to everybody; his life was kind and good. Wherever he went a very benediction of grace and the Word of God was there. Among men he was indeed a royal king, in whose spirit there was no guile.

Brethren, in a word "he, being dead, yet speaketh." He speaketh, brethren, to those of us who are in the ministry. For over 50 years of his life he proclaimed the unspeakable riches of Christ. His ministry covered half a hundred years, and he made it the great business of his life to make those who came under the spell of his influence realize that there was a high, grand and glorious life beyond, and everywhere urged men to make preparation to enter there in peace. Every where he bore testimony to the fact that it was for this grand and transcendent reason that we have been brought into this world. "Being dead, he yet speaketh." Those dead lips are saying to us of the ministry, as he seemed to feel in every year of his faithful pastorate upon earth! "Live for the world to come, setting an example here, leading others in the way of everlasting life." And when we have finished our course, as he, whether our ministry be long or short, may we be so happy as to receive the welcome commendation which I doubt not that he is already receiving: "Worthy servant and son, thou hast been tried and thou hast been found true." And when we come to lay off our mortal bodies and our privilege of preaching the everlasting Word, brethren, may we be so happy as to have the same commedation passed upon us: "Well done, good and faithful servant, thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things; enter into the joy of thy Lord."

ADDRESS OF REV. A. E. HIG-GASON.

I shall not detain you. I have come only to say: Good-by; God be with you. About thirty years I have been associated with Bro. Procter in the work of this local congregation; I have loved him better each succeeding day of this thirty years. I have lost, I think, more than the most of you, but then there must be a gain somewhere. He thought so. He was never afraid to live nor afraid to die. The day before he died he sent for me to come to see him. I went into his room, he stre'ched out his hand with a movement you remember, and with a smile said: "Well, I have come to the end." He said it with a smile—the same you have seen so often. As ready to die as he had been to live. Brethen and friends, he has stood here and spoken words of comfort and consolation to us on just such occasions as this five hundred, and it may be a thousand times. And now we shall hear him no more. But while we are weeping don't you know that those for whom he has spoken those comforting words so often have been made glad? Oh, they are glad! Don't you know, or do you not almost know, that yesterday as he passed through the mists of time over there, mists rendered luminous on the heaven side by the presence of God and of glorified spirits, there was a shout of "Brother Procter has come greeting: among us!" Don't you know there was happiness in heaven? I know I need not, cannot, describe his virtues, his life, his character; they have not been overdrawn. We who knew him best know what they have said is true.

He never touched a human life that he did not make it better. He never laid his hand upon a human heart upon which he did not plant a flower. Oh, he put a smile upon ten thousard lips and words of rejoicing in ten thousand hearts. We need no one to take his place, for he has represented his life in all the lives. He has touched and by his touch made beautiful.

The old apostle and companion of Jesus, the one whom he loved, drew for us a picture, and I have been thinking about that. A beautiful ci y coming down from God, glorious, being the dwelling-place of the Father. I think of it as of glowing white. I think its glowing gates shall never open even to the sign of sin, and all within is beautiful, and that your loved ones and mine are there. I am glad now, oh, so glad! that he has gone among them, for surely, dear brother, that gentle life of tender, loving words, that quiet walk, that living with lofty things, have fitted you to walk the streets of this glorious city. I think I can say in behalf of all this congregation that nobody can ever remember him with more tenderness than we do, and shall go on through life loving him, loving his memory more every day, until we, too, shall cross over into the eternal city where all is light, life and love. Dear brother, pastor, friend, man of God—good-by!

ADDRESS OF REV. LIN CAVE, Pastor of the Christian Church at Independence.

I would be untrue to myself if I did not add just a word. Coming into this community to succeed Bro. Procter in his work and entering this church and coming into this pulpit for the first time on the 18th of last February, it is due to him that I should say: He met me as a brother and as a father and opened at once his great heart to me and said: "Come in and be at home."

It is not an easy thing for the best of us, brethren, to give place to another. The sweetness of spirit, the purity of heart, the nobleness of soul which he manifested toward me upon entering into this ministry as his successor is only in keeping with all you have heard.

His one regret, often expressed—always expressed when I was with him—was his sickness coming on so soon after my coming and hindering him in giving substantial evidence of his cordial desire of being colaborer with me and assisting me.

I will not say anything more, only to repeat that it took one indeed pure in spirit and pure in heart to give another the welcome that he gave me to this church and to this pastorate, that he so loved and in which he labored so well for these 40 years.

The Sage of Independence.

"In every epoch of the world," says Thomas Carlyle, "the great event, the parent of all others, is it not the arrival of a thinker in the world?" A thinker, with high erected thoughts, arrived when Alexander Procter was born. His capacious soul was ablaze with the fires of genius. There was peetry in his philosophy of life and there was the glow of imagination in the science of truth that enabled him to discern "God's fingers working everywhere." It was ever a new delight to witness him bind his awakened and unwearied thoughts with wreaths of many a hue. He was a true diviner of nature.

Alexander Procter's mind was essentially creative. He not only could entertain creative thought; he could adequately place it. He saw truth in its relations and analogies with the eye of reason and imagination. Truth was native to his mind as light was to his eye, and be had the natural talent for finding out new relations and analogies of truth, as Columbus had for the discovery of new paths upon the ses. There was magic in his mind. Had he chosen the chisel or the brush as the instrument of his genius he would have interpreted God in the sculptured marble or on the canvas, touched into life with a rare completion. He had the poet's range of vision and he was one of "God's prophets of the Beautiful."

This combination of reason and imagination elected him at once to the high office of explorer and leader among men in their search for the truth. Few men that have borne an honored part in the struggle of truth toward the light have had a finer intellectual equipment for performing the functions of a pioneer than had Mr. Procter. Being able to see new relations of truth from afar, with the precision and breadth of a poet's vision, he was in advance of his fellows.

It was his length and breadth of vision that brought him into collision with some of his brethren. The counteraction was inevitable. Mr. Procter could reach. Prosaic reasoners could not keep pace with his intellectual strides. He could see. He had bold conceptions of the dignity of Jesus beyond their narrower ken and he beheld visions of the glory of Christ which they could not see. The mind of Mr. Procter moved in a high society where he stood on the vantage ground of truth. He had the liberty of thought and he never closed the door of his genius. Haunted by the poetic voice and vision, the sage of Ind-pendence felt great truths, and he told them from an earnest soul. It was his errand to announce and to lead. He altered men's minds by the generative thought that he threw into the world, and he took them, made for knowledge and for growth, out of servitude into freedom. If he could not be reasoned with it was because he was possessed with an idea.

Mr. Procter was no aspirant for popular applause, nor was he a candidate for public fovor. He had good company in communion with his thoughts, always sublime and ever loyal to truth, whose variety, weight and fineness made him a man of wealth.

His heart kept its twilight hour until death opened one of its doors and let him out. His mind is sure of immortality, for that which engaged his meditation was not sectional or national, but universal. His thoughts, like great deeds, need no trumpet.

Bro. Procter Under Trial.

It was my good fortune to meet Bro. Procter several times during an acquaintance of over twenty-five years. On one occasion I was called to attend him while suffering acutely. He calmly remarked: "Doctor, life is sweet; what you do for me do quickly!" And then turning his eyes heavenward repeated the Savior's memorable words: "Eather, if it be possible-if it be possible-let this cup pass from me," and in almost the next breath, "yet not my will, but thine be done, O God." His condition, the upward glancing of his eyes, the intonations of his voice all combined, rendered it the most pathetic appeal I ever heard. I then and there witnessed the triumph of faith, the Christian's faith. He had reached the highest point to which the good man can hope to attainthat of perfect resignation to the Father's will.

I thank God for his pure life, for his bright and noble example. He seemed to approach Christ-life as nearly as any man I ever knew.

A Timely Book.

I have read with pleasure and profit "The Sources of Alexander Campbell's Theology," by Winfred Ernest Garrisor. It is a work so timely and of such ability as to be easily ranked lamong the most valuable contributions to the iterature of the Disciples. The prescher who is not already informed on this important root of our movement does himself a sore injustice not to read this dissertation.

A Good Chance for Some One.

There is always a good chance for the preacher who is ready. Many a man could add a third to his salary and make his work a half more effective by taking a thorough course with Prof. Ott in the Drake University College of Oratory at Des Moines, Ia.

Our Budget.

- -Kansas state convention Aug. 20-24.
- -Missouri state convention Sept. 17-20.
- —General Convention in Kansas City in Octo-

- -The remaining addresses at the funeral of ro. Procter appear in this paper.
- -Political parties are lining up for one of the armest campaigns in the history of our country.
- —We are still unable to publish all of the any articles received at this office during the ast few weeks. The hot weather has not aterially decreased the stream of supply.
- -Pastors will soon be returning from their acations and the churches will begin to take on gns of new life. Cooler weather seems much acre conducive to a warmer Christianity.
- -M. L. Sornborger, pastor of the Church of hrist in Carondelet, South St. Louis, is an rtist with the brush and used large paintings repared by himself to illustrate his sermons. It has announced a series of sermon themes for angust and September, each of which will be lustrated by a special canvas painting about 6x8 set in dimensions. Bro. Sornborger states that a would reat these paintings to other preachers or a similar use at reasonable figures. His adress is 7310 Michigan Ave.
- —A press dispatch notice to the Globe Demorat, this city, from Chicago, says that the Westrn Passenger Association has granted a rate of ne fare plus $2 to the National Conventions of the Churches of Christ in October next. The date of sale for tickets to be October 11-15 and their

 but if this is the best the Western Association will do by us we shall graciously accept the favor and proceed to have a great convention.
- —The convention of the Bluestone district of the Churches of Christ in W. V. will be held with the church in Bluefield, September 5-9. The announcement says: "You are cordially invited to bring your Bible and be present at all of the services." The use of the Bible and presence at each service is somewhat unusual in convention announcements in these latter days, but they are too important to pass without notice. Other conventions might be greatly improved by insisting upon similar announcements and habits.
- —Our special offer of the Christian-Evangelist from the time subscription is received until January 1, 1901, for fifty cents is still in effect and is meeting with a hearty response. The sooner your subscription is received the more paper: you will secure. We are able to supply a limited number of back numbers for August. Do not forget that this is simply a trial offer; the paper will be discontinued January 1, 1901, unless renewed at regular rates. Tell your friends of this opportunity.
- —The article in this paper by Brother A. B. Jones on "The Spirioual Side of Our Plea" is the last that will appear previous to the publication of the book on this theme. The articles which have appeared under this head, as was stated, are chapters from the contemplated book, that the public might be informed of its nature and purpose beforehand. The copy for the entire book will soon be in the printers' hands and the work will be pushed to completion as rapidly as the facilities of the Christian Publishing Co. will permit.

- This is the time for all sorts of excursions, vacation trips, etc., and hence the railroad cars are generally crowded. It is a great advantage, therefore, to be one of a party on a special coach, thus being assured of a comfortable seat and congenial company. Of course, you are going to the state convention at Moberly, Mo.; you really ought. We need to put more energy and zeal into our state work and you can help by attending our conventions. The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST will provide a special coach leaving St. Louis at 9:15 A. M., Monday, via the Wabash. If you are going, send word to that effect or write for any further information. Address W. D. Cree, this office.
- -Convention of Christian Workers is to be held at the Moody Bible Institute in Chicago, Sept. 19-26. The convention will be devoted to prayer, consideration of methods and fellowship. A large list of noted speakers have been secured for addresses, talks, etc. An invitation is extended to pastors, evangelists, missionaries, church officers, Sunday-school workers and Christians generally. Denominational lines to be wholly ignored. The singing is to be in charge of Prof. D. B. Towner, of Chicago. The only expense will be board, lodging and transportation. One and one-third rates are expected from the railroads for the convention. It is expected that this convention will greatly increase the revivals and evangelistic spirit in the churches that shall be repre-
- The advice of one of the delegates at the Tuskegee Negro Conference for 1900 to "raise your own corn and bacon and 'taters" is proving to be the salvation of the negro farmers in the South. Under this wise counsel, it is said that many regroes are paying off their mortgages and becoming land owners. Many others of other races might also profit by the same good advice.
- -Lovers of the wild, romantic scenery of the mountains cannot fail to be interested in Robert E. Strohorn's most fascinating article in the Americian Review of Reviews for August on the volcanic scenery of the Northwest. It is not only admirably written, but reveals wonders in nature that thrills the soul with astonishment. The stupendous magnitude of some of the works of nature in the region named staggers the intellect. Surely must one stand in majestic awe in the presence of such exhibitions of divine power. To view such inexpressible grandeur apart from the puny works of man makes one peculiarly and deeply conscious of God's presence in nature. One feels at such a time that he is standing on holy ground; that he is in God's temple: that he is before the very throne of God
- -There is no hope for improvement in the famine distric's of India until October and November, and then the relief will only be partial. The British Government is caring for about six millions of sufferers daily and has already expended about seventy millions of dollars in their behalf. Other agencies are also doing nobly in their efforts to save life and ameliorate suffering. The New York committee of one hundred is still at work forwarding relief and also the missionary boards, among which our own C. W. B. M. and Foreign Board are doing a good work. The suffering in India is simply indescribable, and those in the world who are enjoying the ordinary comforts of life, and especially those who have an abundance, ought to freely give of their substance for their relief. There is no excuse. These committees get nothing for their services and all that is given goes direct to the sufferers and is distributed by those who know where and how to give for the greatest good. You can send through one of our mission boards or through the Brown Bros., 59 Wall St., New York City.

- —One of the most prosperous churches in the country seems to be that of Gainesville, Texas, of which J. B. Sweeney is pastor. To this church 402 members have been added within the last eighteen months; thirty-eight since the close of their recent revival, conducted by Chas. Reign Scoville.
- -The Presbyterian Church has at last passed the million mark in membership. In their report for 1900 the membership is placed at 1,007,689 and the Sunday school membership at 1,058,051. The Herald and Presbyter says "the last year has been the best in the history of the church." During the year the church raised for all purposes the sum of $15,054,301, or $14.94 per capita. This is munificent giving. Not as much, per capita the Herald says, as in 1870, when it was $18.90, but better than in previous years and encouraging. Over $1,000,000 was raised for Home Missions, nearly as much for Foreign Missions and almost a million for other mission boards. If any have thought that the leading evangelical churches were declining they will have to modify their views in the face of the above figures.
- -The articles on Kansas and her resources which appeared in Sheldon's edition of the Topeka Capital, written by Mr. F. D. Coburn, secretary of the Kansas State Board of Agriculture, have been republished in neat tract form and make a very convenient compendium of facts for those interested in the welfare of that great state or who may be desirous of a home or investments within its borders. A number of illustrations have been added which emphasize the claims of the book. The tract or booklet has been published by the Atchisor, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Company, and the copy on our desk belongs to the 20th thousand which indicates something of the value and popularity of the publication. We presume a copy of this tract on Kansas and her resources may be had of A Andrews, General Agent of the Santa Fe Route, 108 North Fourth St., St. Louis.
- —In writing on the death of Alexander Procter N. A. Walker, Ft. Wayne, Ind., recalls with great pleasure his "soul-stirring, heart-filling, life-giving address at Louisville, Ky., at the organization of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society." Brother Procter's great sermons and addresses are not easily forgotten by those who heard them. They possessed strong, penetrating and adhesive qualities.
- Presid nt Harper, of the University of Chicago, is attracting considerable attention in the world by his denunciation of "diploma mills," his prophecy of a kind of educational trust, or combination of educational institutions and his reported attempt at keeping his household table at cost not to exceed fifteen cents per capita per day. We are glad to see attempts at reforms originating from such a sour e. If the Dr. succeeds at economic reforms in domestics he may discover it posble to run a great university with less money.
- —The name of D. R. Dungan, A. M., LL. D., now leads the faculty of Christian Un.v rsity, Canton, Mo. The annual catalog and announcement for 1900 1901 is out and offers splendid inducements to young men seeking an education, and especially those desiring to fit themselves for the ministry. With a man of Dr. Dungan's experience, scholarship and reputation at its head Christian University ought to make splendid headway during the next college year.
- —The Church of Christ in Glascoe, Kan., is without a preacher and would be glad to correspond with a man who can be had for one-half time. It is said that the other half time can be taken within easy reach of Glascoe. Address G. W. Smail.

-- The souvenir program of the twelfth annual convention of the (burches of Christ in Southern California, at Long Beach, August 9-19, is a neat, artistic affair. These will be surnished free to the convention by the publisher, H. Elliott Ward.

-Brethren who expect to attend the Missouri state convention at Moberly, Sept. 17-20, are urged to send their names to Samuel B. Moore. pastor Central Christian Church in that city, as soon as possible, so that entertainment may be provided for them. Do not neglect this very important matter.

-The article in this paper on "Christ," by Ben Greenstein, is well worthy of the attention of our most thoughtful readers. The peculiar style of the writer may not be pleasing to some, but when you understand that the writer is a young Hebrew, who is yet a boy in years but a philosopher in mind, the style will not prevent your appreciation of the grasp of the writer's mind upon the Christ and his influence upon the world. This is the second time this writer has appeared in our columns, the former article being headed "The University of Adversity," but unfortunately the type made his name to read Erskine instead of Greenstein. The article on Christ in this paper is certainly put in an original way.

-Do not forget the Missouri convention at Moberly, Sept 17-20. Just because Missouri entertain the National Convention in October is no reason why we should not have a good attendance at the state gathering. It is rather a good reason why we should have the best meeting in our history. The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST will have a spec'al coach on the Wabash train leaving St. Louis at 9:15 A. M., Monday, Sept. 17, provided a sufficient number of those who expect to attend will take the trouble to drop us a postal card to that effect. It is absolutely necessary that we know that the coach will be needed before we can secure it. Notify W. D. Cree in care of this

-In speaking of Alexander Procter's characteristics, C. P. Evans, of Arapahoe, Neb., who knew him well, says: "If he became aware of having wounded a fellowbeing by word or deed he was ever ready to make ample reparation of it."

-A town of 4,000 inhabitants and three colleges in the Indian Territory wants a competent preacher, a married man without children, whose wife is a worker, at $50 per month to begin on, with opportunity to work it up to $100 per month. Let such a one address F. G. Roberts, Cor. Sec., Venita, I. T.

-The catalog of Add-Ran University, Waco, Texas, post office, Hermoson, for 1899-1900, and announcement for 1900 1901, not only shows a prosperous year closed, but sets forth the promise of a better one following. The equipment of the college, its faculty, location, courses of study set forth in this catalog ought to be strong inducements to young men in Texas and elsewhere who are seeking an education to attend Add-Ran University.

-Having failed of the privilege of an intimate acquaintance with Alexander Procter I hesitate to obey the impulse of my heart to lay upon his newmade grave an humble tribute of admiration. nimbus of dignity and grace with which my boy-hood's fancy crowned the noble head that, save when lifted to the heights that held the transfigurated Christ, was bowed in childlike humility, has not been dimmed by the passing years. I shall love to think of it now as having been changed into the crown of glory which is the re-ward of the faithful. The fallen oak leaves a great gap in the forest. The death of Bro. Procter leaves a great gap in the ranks of the mighty men of God. After his long years of toil may his rest be sweet.

-James McComb, in speaking of Alexander Procter, says: "His life has been an inspiration to me for a higher and holier life."

-Just think of receiving the CHRISTIAN-EVAN-GELIST five months for fifty cents! That is what you may do by sending at once. This offer is made to hose not now subscribers that they may have an opportunity of becoming thoroughly acquainted with the merits of the CHRISTIAN-EVAN-GELIST. Of course, we confidently expect them to continue as readers at regular rates after Jan. 1, 1901, but that is a matter that they will be free to decide for themselves. With little effort nearly every present reader of this journal can secure one or more trial subscribers. If the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is an aid to gou, do not your neighbors also need it?

-W. P. Bentley, our missionary at Shanghai, China, from whom we publish a letter in this paper, writes Alva W. Taylor, of Cincinnati, O., concerning the "Students' Missionary Campaign Library" as follows:

DEAR BROTHER: — The effort to place the Students' Missionary Campaign Library in the hands of Endeavorers and the young people generally is deserving of every success. I have a a more or less familiar knowledge of nearly all the books, several of which are in my library. Information must precede intelligent action. Knowledge is at the basis of success. Missions are their own best argument. At the price, hundreds if not thousands of these libraries should be sold. Their influence would tell upon the future life, consecration and liberality of our people. A demand for them now shows the existing missionary interest, while their dissemination will multiply the demand for the years to come. Push them; fruit will follow.

-In complianc with a broken-hearted father's request and because of the distress of the family named we publish the following card. boy was supposed to have destroyed himself in Lake Michigan, but later investigation leaves room to hope that he is still living:

To Otis Gordon Springer:-There being no positive proof of your death, it is hoped that you came to yourself and that you are still living. Your mother's grief is indescribable. If still alive, know this: I do not hold you alone responsit le for the cause of your disappearance; there are others not blameless, of whom I may be one, by unwittingly offering chiding for sympathy; for this my heart is breaking. Whatever wrong you may have done, come back to us and let us help you to live it down; remembering that father, mother, it down; remembering that father, mother, brother, sister, wife and babies love you still. Your loving but grief-stricken father,

J. M. SPRINGER. Carthage, Ill., Aug. 3, 1900.

Any newspaper in the land that will insert above notice in its news columns will confer a lasting favor on the writer and on sorrowing friends.

-Two of our pioneer preachers have recently left us and gone to their reward, B. H. Smith and A. Procter. They were both scholarly, good and grand proclaimers of the gospel of Christ. were both younger than myself, which admonishes me that (in the course of nature) the time of my departure is close at hand. God help me to be prepared for that solemn event. I was better acquainted with Bro. Procter than I was with Bro. Smith, and while we did not always agree in our view of divine things I always regarded him as strictly honest in his views, and I loved him as a brother in Christ. If I am so fortunate as to get to heaven, I expect to meet Bro. Procter and Bro. Smith, there and a host of others, where we may renew and perfect our acquaintance. O. P. DAVIS.

Prairie Home, Mo.

-Alexander Procter was indeed a great and good man. I shall ever count it a most precious privilege to have known this great and godly man and to have heard him preach. The Lord raised up unto us a host of young men like unto him.

Though in his 76th year he did not outlive his usefulness. His life was a benediction to the end.

-Dr. B. B. Tyler, who has been delivering a number of addresses at Fountain Park Assembly at Remington, Ind.; is to assist R. W. Castor in a meeting in Leon, Ia., beginning Aug. 19. Of the Assembly Bro. Tyler writes:

Fountain Park Assembly has been a success this season. The program has been full of good things. Dr. H. O. Breeden gave us two good lectures, one on "The Crisis of the Hour" and one on his journeyings in the Orient. He left us this morning. Bishop C. C McCabe will lecture this (Saturday) afternoon and preach at 3:00 P to-morow. I cannot speak extravagantly of C. B. Newman. His work as a preacher and teacher has been excellent.

-The generous hearted Christians ought to remember the suffering in India and send generous offerings to F. M. Rains, Treas., Box 884, Cincinnati, O., for the famine relief. More than $12,000 has been given for this purpose, but this is a small amount compared with the great reed.

-The following interesting note is from Marion Lawre ce, Gen. Sec. International Sunday school work, to whom apply for further information:

More sacrifices are made in the name of religion than for any other cause. At the recent State Sunday school convention held in Idaho, one man traveled over 400 mil-s on horseback to attend the convention. One of the delegates was tend the convention. One of age, who traveled over 300 m les to re res nt the only Sunday-school in her county. One young man, 22 years school in her county. One young man, 22 years of age, traveled over 600 miles, about one half of it in a stage coach, and had never seen a railroad train until the one that had brought him Pocatello. Many other delegates made sacrifi es like this to attend the convention. To this meetin the international committee had sent several prominent Sunday-school work rs from the East, and Idaho was one of the eleven states visited on this tour. For circulars describing the international Sunday-school work apply to Marion Lawrence, General Secretary, Toledo, O.

-In an interesting article in the Forum for July, by Dr. D. Z. Sheffield, late president of the North China College and a resident of that country for thirty years, he clearly shows that while the nation has some high idea s of life it fails to realize these ideals. His conclusion of the matter is stated thus:

The hope of China is not in itself. The realization of its best thought must come from without. Christian civilization will bring a truer conception of the nature of man, a better under-standing of his relations and duties, of his dignity and destiny. It will turn the faces of the people from the past toward the future, and will enrich their lives with a quality of love and fellowship that Confucian civilization has been powerless to

A Universal Food.

FOLLOWING NATURE'S FOOTSTEPS.

"I have a boy, two years old, weighing forty pounds and in perfect health who has been raised on Grape-Nuts and milk.

"This is an ideal food and evidently furnishes the elements necessary for a baby as well as for adults. We have used Grape-Nuts in large quantities and greatly to our advantage." F. W. LEAVITT, Minneapolis, Minn.

One advantage about Grape-Nuts Food is that it is pre-digested in the process of manufacture; that is, the starch contained in the wheat and barley is transformed into grape sugar in exactly the same method as this process is carried out in the human body, that is, by the use of moisture and long exposure to moderate warmth, which grows the diastase in the grains and makes the remarkable change from starch to grap sugar. Therefore, the most delicate stomach can handle Grape-Nuts and the food is quickly absorbed into the blood and tissue, certain parts of it going directly to building and nourishing the brain and nerve centers.

Besides preaching, overseeing the building and other things he put in nearly $50 worth of work on the building. He goes from Waterloo to Walker, Iowa, to do a similar work.

I wish through the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST to commend the work of Prof. C. E Millard. He is thoroughly equipped with illustrated songs, using the same with much power, both in drawing and impressing vast audiences as a "sweet singer in Israel." He compares favorably with Sankey, Stebbins, Towner, Excell and Billhorn. He possesses a clear, winsome and powerful voice. He pronounces his words distinctly and sings with the "spirit and the understanding" I have witnessed his work through Fountain Park Assembly and commend him to churches, chautauquas, lyceums and all lovers of high-class music.—G. F. HALL.

Fannie H. Christopher, of Benton Harbor, Mich., whose 84th birthday was celebrated by her friends on the 20th day of last May, writes us in a plain, clear, steady style of penmanship that would do credit to about nine-tenths of the copy received at this office. Sister Christopher and her daughter are charter members of the C. W. B. M. and still takes an active it terest in the welfare of this and other Christian activities. May God's abounding mercies richly sustain and comfort Sister Christopher until called to her heavenly home.

August 5 was the fiftieth anniversary of the marriage of Elder E. E. Harvey and wife. Brother Harvey has also been 35 years in the ministry of the Church of Christ. There were 26 of his children, grandchildren at d great-grandchildren at the reunion. The high esteem in which they are both held by relatives and friends was shown by valuable gifts. Among other things was $46 in gold. Their cup of joy was full. It is a great privilege to enjoy the fellowship of these "old soldiers of the cross," and a pleasure to know that their labor of love has been appreciated. W. J. R E. L. Prunty, pastor of the Church of Christ in Unionville, Mo., for five and a half years, has resigned, to take effect October 1st. During Bro Prunty's faithful pastorate at Unionville 344 persons have united with the church in North Missouri, 144 of whom took membership with the church in Unionville. The greater part of the 344 persons were received by obedience to the gospel. The church will be entirely free from debt before Bro. Prunty leaves. As he has not yet decided on his future field of work some church in need of a preacher who bas good staying qualities should seize upon Bro. He is an energetic man and believes in keeping the church abreast of the times in all that comports with Christian His wife is a devoted friend of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST and has complete files of it for many years past. Bro. Sims expects to devote all his time to preaching in Arkansas, and we are sure that he is entering a field where preaching is greatly needed. This is true of other fi-lds, but especially so of Southeast Missouri and Arkansas, where we as yet have but few preachers. We wish Bro. Sims abounding success preachers. We in his new field.

A Most Charming Volume.

"The great and good do not die even in this world. Embalmed in books, their spirits walk abroad."

Seldom, if ever, have we read a volume with more real, genuine pleasure and profit than that afforded by "Leaves from Mission Fields," written by N. M. Ragland, Fayetteville, Ark., and published by the Christian Publishing Co., St. Louis, Mo. The beauty and neatness of the volume fitly suggests the beautiful spirit that breathes upon every page.

To any one acquainted with the spirit of the author, the work is not a surprise; and yet, he is hardly prepared for such a constant feast of good things, delightful, entertaining, instructive, inspiring, spiritual.

In a very old volume it is written by a very wise king: "Of making many books there is no end, and much reading is a weariness of the flesh;" but the reading of this volume gives joy to the heart and refreshes the soul. Said Sir John Lubbock: "There are books and books, and there are books which are not books at all." But a good book—who can estimate its value? Ba on calls them ships of thought voyaging through the sea of time and carrying precious freight so safely from generation to generation.

The author of "Leaves from Mission Fi lds" has chosen to gather his offering from fields most intensely interesting and helpful. What so strongly and deeply moves us as the lives of men and women, the makers of the world's history? "Man," says Emerson, "can paint or make or think nothing but man." The Book of all books is replete with the experiences of men and women, patriarchs, prophets, kings and judges, apostles and ministers. From these in all ages men and women have drawn their best strength, their highest wisdom. Its words live in the heart like a music that can never be forgotten.

Bro. Ragland takes his readers into the secret chambers—the Holy of Holies—in the lives of the missionaries. He seeks to discover to the reader the temper and also the formative influences that sent these men and women forth to lives of heroism and of sacrifice, and to such high and noble destiny

One is impressed as he reads, that with the author nothing happens; but in every occurrence he sees the divine hand working out the great problem of the centuries—the evangelization of the world. Under the writer's delicate touch the "hills and valleys, seas and constellations, are but stereotypes of the divine idea, appealing to and answered by the living soul of man." Every page is rich in thought.

The reader is delighted and surprised to find how much the missionaries had in common with the apostles of the early church. The writer's soul is in the work and he gives us thoughts from a heart warm with the fires of missionary zeal. Out of much study, love and prayer he has given to the reading world these "heart-throbs." "He that would bring home the wealth of the Indies must carry out the wealth of the Indies." For richness of thought, wealth of spiritual food and beauty of expression the book is unsurpassed.

We be peak for this book a wide and careful reading by all lovers of our Lord's work in the world. Buy it, read it, reread it and lend it to your friend. Thus shall you perpetuate in the world the helpful influences of these heroes of the cross who, like the faithful Abel of old, "though dead, are yet spoken of."

"The dead but sceptred sovereigns,
Who still rule our spirits from their urns."

Springfield, Mo. D. W. Moore.

Correspondence.

The Lands of the Long Day-VI.

THE QUEST OF THE MIDNIGHT SUN.

My bed in the open air in latitude of sixty-three did not prove fatal, but it certainly was none too comfortable. There was no temptation to oversleep, and I was grateful for the brevity of these northern nights. By three o'clock the sun was an hour high and I rode on thirty miles to the first town which had an inn, arriving in time for an early breakfast. The outcome of it all was that I caught the steamer which I had been struggling to catch for the past three days, reached the mouth of the Romsdal that evening and spent the next two days in riding up that "Norwegian Yosemite," over the dreary Dovre Fjeld, where wild reindeer are still to be found, and on to Trondhjem, the gateway to the farther north, where this section of my cycling trip ended; for, so far as continuous touring is concerned, there are no roads in Norway north of this point.

It will be remembered that the Norwegian part of the Scandinavian peninsula is shaped not unlike a huge gourd, with the bulb toward the south and the long and very narrow neck curving away toward the northeast; or, like West Virginia, if its Panhandle were extended up to Montreal or Quebec. Trondbjem is in the same relative position as Wheeling in this revised map of West Virginia. That is to say, in proceeding north from there one immediately jumps out of the fryingpan onto the panhandle. (The usual conclusion of that saying would not be literally applicable to a plunge into the arctics, but I am not sure but that it might have a degree of paradoxical appropriateness.)

The panhandle of Norway, known generally as the Nordland, is a tangle of barren and snowy mountains, pierced with fjords and fringed with countless islands as mountainous and barren as the mainland. Except in rare spots there are no trees, no pastures and no inhabitants. Only the sea is fertile, and the three considerable towns and several stations between Trondhjem and the North Cape derive their significance solely from the fisheries.

Trondhjem itself, a city of more than 30,000, is a place of great commercial as well as historical importance. It is the ancient capital of Norway, but like Upsala in Sweden, Roskilde in Denmark and Moscow in Russia, long since deprived of its political primacy. But it is still honored as the cradle of Norse liberty, for it was there, about the time when William Norman was conquering England, that Norway first made good its claim to be independent of the sway of Denmark. It is required by the present constitution of the united kingdoms of Norway and Sweden that the kings shall be crowned in the Cathedral of Trondhjem.

Everything in Norway burns down periodically. Four times I have, before coming into a town, selected a hotel from the list in the gu'debook, and have found it in ashes, having burned within the last few weeks. Except in the larger cities there are few houses of any material but wood, and most of the towns which have repeated y been destroyed by fire have at last been rebuilt with very wide streets. This is the case with Trondhjem. The houses are all of timber, even the royal palace, which is said to be the "largest tree building in Norway," as a Norseman told me. The streets are so broad and ill-paved and the buildings so small and far apart that the first impression of the place is of a wilderness of cobblestones.

But it is really a very excellent city, with a large trade and good shops. There was one place, for instance, that I got acquainted with where the shopkeeper handled two commodities—fishing-tackle and violins. I do not remember to have seen that combination before, but it struck me as being good. Surely, the music of a good reel when played upon by a competent salmon is not less sweet to the sportsman's ear than to the musician's is the tone which a well-drawn bow conjures from an old amati. I bought some salmon tackle from the man in recognition of his originality and taste in classing violins and reels together, and also in view of the fact that I am going into the greatest salmon country in the world—barring always the Columbia River, which doesn't count from the angier's point of view because its salmon cannot be caught with a fly.

Early one morning the steamer started for the north. It was not the tourist steamer, but an express boat which is as large, as well equipped and as fast as the other, but carries for the most part Norse instead of English passengers and charges only half the fare There were only two English-speaking people on the boat besides myself, and they were the obnoxious English kind, so I consorted chiefly with the Norse. It was something of a relief to be among people who are doing something rather than among those who are merely running around the world looking at the outside of things. There were a lot of young people returning from school in Trondbjem to spend the long vacation in their homes in the farther north. There was an old gentleman with all the dignity which is attached to the ideal of a United States senator who bore the title of "Direktor" and was evidently somebody. There was a mining engineer going to the copper mines in the Alten Fjord. There was a surveyor just back from South Africa to recover from fever. All of these and a good many more were interesting.

It is a three days' run from Trondhjem to Hammerfest, the town nearest to the North Cape. The first day the vessel steers through a maze of small, rocky islands. They are as barren, as devoid of either grass or trees, as Plymouth Rock, but here and there ensetles a fisherman's hut, and it is an interesting game to guess where the steamer is going to find a way through the tangle of islands. Neither on the mainland nor on the islands do the hills rise high enough to be called mountains or to make very imposing scenery.

Early the second morning we crossed the Arctic Circle. The jolt was not violent enough to awaken one, and when I emerged a couple of hours later to get my first glimpse of the Arctic Zone, the sun was shining bright and warm and it was quite comfortable to stand about the deck without wraps. This day we had genuine mountains, lofty, snow clad, rugged and beautiful. At noon we reached the first important town on this coast. The obnoxious Englishman and his obnoxious wife disembarked here and I observed among the "luggage" in their boat as they rowed off, a bundle of golf sticks, two fishing rods, three canes, a pair of snowshoes, a small tin bathtub and a folding willow chair.

Opposite this port is the southern extremity of that magnificant mountain chain, the Lofoten Islands, which stretches away in a vast crescent to the northeast and approaches the mainland a hundred miles farther north. It is here at the southern end that the famous mælstrom or whirlpool is found, about which fabulous tales are told. I remember one thrilling story of an adventure in it which I read in very early youth, and which furnished material for many nightmares. And I recall, to, a passage in Purchas Pigrims, in which the veracious traveler gives a quaintly worded description, which is almost verbally as follows:

"Note that there is between these two island a whirlepool which from halte ebbe until half floud maketh such a terrible noyse that shaketi the rings in the doors of the inhabitants' house of the said islands ten miles off. Also, if there cometh any whale into the current of the same they make a pitiful cry."

The sober truth is that there is a swift current there which is sometimes dangerous to small fishing boats when the tide is wrong. The "pitifull cry" of the whales may perhaps have more accurate reference to a natural whale-trap on a neighboring island, a narrow bay which whales have been known to enter at high tide and from which they have not been able to escape.

At half past eleven that evening the sun was shining brightly in the north just above the jagged mountains of the Lofoten Islands. The wind had died and the sea had only enough motion to make the reflections of the sunset glory tremulous as if to show that the scene were alive. The snowy mountains of the manland across the sound were coral pink in the rays of the almost midnight sun. We awaited the magic hour. But the vessel must follow its course, and unluckily its course at that moment took us into port close under the hills. The stroke of "eight bells" found us shut off by the mountains from a direct view of the sun's disc, but the radiance of the scene was undimmed and it still shone on the mountains to the south, whose gilded reflection came back to us over a sea of molten gold. Half an hour later we were in sight of the sun again, sliding slowly eastward along the northern horizon, and it was sunrise now. I did not see the midnight sun, that first night in the arctics. but I think I saw all its glories.

The third day it rained and there was fog, and a gale from the northwest swept in upon us and some long waves from that ugly corner of the sea where the Atlantic and Arctic Oceans meet. slipped through our guard of sheltering islands to add to the discomfort. We touched of Tromso. an important fishing and trading town, and I went ashore in a rowboat on an absurd and hopeless search for kodak films, having heard that there was one amateur photographer in the place. There were several Lapps on the street in their fantastic costumes, but we shall have more of them later. At midnight we came into the Harbor of Hammerfest, a place which enjoys the barren honor of being the most northerly town in the world. The reader will not regret its remoteness when he learns that its chief commodity is codliver oil. It is a busy-looking place with a harbor full of ships and fishing boats, a row of big wooden warehouses and three churches-Lutheran, Catholic and Baptist.

Here I changed to another steamer to go on aroune the North Cape to Vadso, a port a couple of hundred miles farther east on the Arctic Ocean and on the border of Lapland. Beyond Hammerfest the scenery is of the dreariest description and its melancholy effect was heightened by a freezing rain and a fog which almost shut out the view of the coast.

The reader may be already aware (I was not until rather recently) that the famous North Cape, which has acquired such an enormous reputation as the most northerly point in Europe, is not really on the continent at all, but on an island. The tourist steamers make it their objective point and then return by the way they came, and the tourist agents endeavor to maintain the delusion about its being the most northerly point because the real most northerly point on the continent is not so convenient to visit. Passing through the strait which separates this island from the mainland we come, two degrees farther east, to the promontory of Nordkyn, a rocky point of dark-gray slate, rising high above the sea. Here is the true torthern terminus of the continent of Europe.

There were no sheltering islands n w to protect our course from the fury of the Arctic Ocean. A gale swept down from the north as if to drive us upon that hideous frozen coast. As we rounded the Nordkyn I stood by the binnacle and watched the course of the versel change from east-northeast to south-west-by-west, and I rejoiced in the thought that that moment my homeward journey had begun. It was noon on the Fourth of July. I spent rather a quiet Fourth that day. I was going to try to bribe the captain to shoot off a signal rocket in honor of that day, but it occurred to me that they probably don't carry rockets at this time of the year where it never gets dark and the lighthouses are not lit up for three months. The trade in fireworks would be sadly limited if our country were in this latitude where the sun never sets on the Fourth of July and where the merry pin-wheel, even if fired at night, must compete with solar brilliance-or with a fog, as is this case. I had my celebration by playing "America" on the piano in the cabin. Everybody on board at once recognized it as "God Save the Queen," and set me down as a homesick English-

We touched shortly at a sheltered bay where a whale was being boiled down into trainoil. The skeleton of the leviathan lay upon the beach and a mighty odor of boiling whale arose and smote the arctic sky. A little later we put into the busy trading port of Vardo, a place of 2,000 inhabitants, from which Nansen sailed on his polar expedition in 1893. There was a lady on board who said she lived here but spent the winters in Christiania whence she was now returning. I could scarcely imagine any intelligent English-speaking person calling this isolated spothome

A little after midnight we reached Vadso and I was happy to step ashore, for I had suffered more of the agonies of mal de mer in that little trip on the Arctic Ocean than I have in seven crossings of the Atlautic. Next morning I purchased provisions for a week, chiefly in the form of tinned meat, which I packed in a knapsack on my back. Thus accoutred and with my fishing rod and other luggage strapped to my wheel I started on the only road within three hundred miles, a road which runs west forty miles along Varanger Fjord and over the watershed to the Tana River—and then stops.

The road, though rudely made, was surprisingly good for wheeling, but the wind had now shifted to the west and beat in my face with a violence which threatened to drive my teeth down my throat. I cannot remember a harder ride than against that Lapland wind. Half way on the road it began to rain. When I was well drenched it turned to sleet and then to a very wet snow. Pity I could not have had the snowstorm as a part of my Fourth-of-July celebration. But the good things of life cannot all come at once.

The Tana River flows nearly north through the heart of Lapland. I am now twenty-five miles from the mouth of the river and have found lodging for the night at the log house of a hospitable Lapp. A canoe has been engaged and two boatmen (Lapps, of course,) with whom I am to start to-morrow morning for Utsjoki, seventy-five miles up the river, where I must take my chances for another boat. My host is trying to persuade me to trade him my bicycle for a suit of reindeer furs, and we may come to terms in the morning. The wheel will be an article of buggage anyway rather than a means of locomotion for several hundred miles.

I have been examining the bed in which I am to sleep to-night and find that it has neither sheets, blankets nor quilts. I am to lie on the skin of a big white bear and cover myself with a bag of eider down. It does not seem seasonable in July, but it fits the temperature well enough, for while the calendar says July the themometer testifies that it is January.

Chicago Letter.

The work of the settlement known as Hull House in this city has attracted wide attention. The young woman who was chiefly instrumental in its founding, Miss Jane Addams, is now in Paris, and has received marked attention from notable men and women. The Saturday Evening Post says: "The Frenchmen, enthusiastic when an attractive woman is concerned, unanimously agreed as to her magnetic charm, and vied with each other in expressing admiration for the woman herself and for the earnestness with which she presented her views on the lives and conditions of the poor, and the possibilities of close and sympathetic touch in ameliorating those conditions."

Miss Addams is a typical Western girl. She was born in Illinois, where her father was prominent as a political leader. After graduation she and a voung woman friend, a classmate, traveled through Europe for further study and to gather a wider and deeper knowledge of the world and its needs before taking up their life work. It was the deprivation and sorrows of the poor in the cities of Europe that turned their hearts toward slum work as a much-needed philanthropy, and resulted in the establishment of Hull House. For ten years now this settlement has been carrying on its beneficent work in one of the worst sections of the city. Its influence is felt from the obscurest and most squalid garret to the City Hall, for the house deals in a form of righteousness that gets out of Sunday and asserts itself at the pol's.

Miss Addams holds, in common with most thoughtful observers, that "settlement" work is but one expression of a broad and deep humanitarianism that is now pervading all ranks and conditions of men, and it is one of the most sane. scientific and Christlike of them all. The Third Church, Indianapolis, C. C. Rowlison, pastor, has established a neighborhood house in that city, through which they are pouring out their sympathy and love for the unchurched. Bro. Rowlison has left Macatawa, and on his way home last week spent a few days visiting the settlements of Chicago, notably Chicago Commons, of which Prof. Graham Taylor is the popular and efficient head, and Hull House. Bro. Bellamy, head of Hiram House, Cleveland, O., is spending a few days in Macatawa. It is a pleasure to note these efforts by young Disciples to study society at firsthand and engage in direct work for the relief of those who are crowded into close and unwholesome quarters. There is in present conditions every reason why we should engage in this form of work, and in our polity and general character no reason why we should not. E. W. Darst and wife served a term at it while in this city.

After five years of phenomenally successful work J. H. O. Smith resigns and leaves. At a meeting of the congregation it was voted unacimously to reject his resignation, and a committee was appointed to intercede with him. But it is not, as he says, a matter of desire, but simply consideration for Mrs. Smith's health. These two have toiled and wrought together in the vineyard as few preachers and their wives can. Union Church, of 1,000 members, meeting in the People's Institute, is their monument. Fro. Smith has no plans for the future.

Errett Gates has been elected dean in the Divinity House, associated with Dr. Willett. He will devote himself to the work of the house and represent its financial interests in the field, laboring to secure a much-needed endowment. Willett, McClintock and Gates will give extensive lectures among the churches, being available for this service from October to April.

The unsolved problem in Chicago to-day is the maintenance and development of the missions already planted. Under the present regime all that seems to be accomplished is to keep them alive. If they are ever to grow and flourish and become centers of power and light, more effort must be put forth, and that means more money must be employed. Most of them are at present manned by students from the university. These men are making sacrifices for the work and rendering a service which cannot be duplicated from any other source. Their work is of a uniformly high grade, but it is not enough. What shall be done?

I. J. Spencer's meeting at Evanston is giving entire satisfaction. He is reaching the people as they have not been reached in this elegant suburb heretofore, and preaching the gospel in its simplicity and power. My own vacation ended with July 31st, just as the intense heat of summer began. Nevertheless, it is a pleasure to get back into the harness and join the earnest and devoted band known as the First Church in the work of the Master.

A Pungent Food Drink

WITH THE TASTE OF COFFEE.

Perhaps no one has suffered more from the use of coffee or failed oftener in the attempt to leave it off than I have. Although I never drank more than half a cup at a time, it even then gave me sour stomach and a whole catalogue of misery. This kept up for a long period and time and again I have resolved that I positively would drink no more coffee, but alas! the rest of the family used it, and, like the reformed drunkard who smells whiskey and falls again, when I smelled coffee, I could not resist it.

"Finally, we came to try Postum Food Coffee, and my trouble was over at once. There I had my favorite beverage—a crisp, dark brown, rich coffee, with a fine, pungent coffee taste, and yet with no sour stomach or nervous troubles after it. On the contrary, I have gained gradually in strength and sturdy health. All who have spoken to me about Postum agree, and we have found it so, that the directions for making must be followed, and it must be boiled at least fifteen minutes, or more, and it also requires the addition of good cream. We have tried boiling it a few minutes when in a special hurry, but found it insipid and unsatisfactory; whereas, by proper boiling, it is dark and rich, with a delightful flavor.

"Dr. McMillan, of Sunbeam, Ill, said he had used Postum and found it to be just as good as coffee, and more healthful. He is an M. D. of fine standing. Mr. David Strong and sister have left off coffee and are using Postum. They find it much more healthful. Rev. W. T. Campbell, pastor of the Second United Presbyterian Church of this city, says: 'You may say anything good that you wish about Postum Food Coffee and I will substantiate it.' He was a very great lover of coffee and yet found it very injurious to his health. He now drinks Postum three times a day and the old troubles have disappeared.

"I shrink from having my name appear in public. The statement I have given you is truthful, and I hope will aid some people to discover that coffee is the cause of their aches and ails, and they are in a way to get rid of their troubles by leaving off coffee and taking up Postum Food Coffee."

This lady lives at Monmouth, Ill., and her name can be given by letter upon application to the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., makers of Postum, at Battle Creek, Mich.

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

Fountain Park Assembly is an interesting place. It is in the midst of a rich and prosperous agricultural district about a hundred miles southeast from Chicago, near the town of Remington, the capital of Jasper County, Ind The Assembly began in a moderate way as a merely local enterprise and for the meral, social, in ellectual and spiritual well-being of the region in which it is situated, but it is steadily increasing in magnitude and scope, as well as in every other respect, to such a degree that it bids fair to become in a few years one of the important summer assemblies of the country. The attendance this year exceeds that of last year, as the attendance last year exceeded that of any preceding year. The Fountain Park Assembly began in 1875. Its growth has been from the first steady and healthy.

Mr. Robert Parker is the inspiring, animating and guiding spirit in this work. He is a member of the Christian Church in Remington, and the printed letterhead of the Fountain Park Assembly says that it is "under the direction of the Christian Church." But the names of Methodists, Presbyterians, Baptists and others, as well as members of the Christian Church, appear on the program. The work is chiefly educational, with a decided religious character. There is a sermon every day during the week, and three discourses on each Lord's day. An hour each day is also given to Bible study. Even the literary and musical entertainments are religious in character. This comes apparently as a result of the general Christian atmosphere which prevails on the grounds. There is no order saying, either in words or by implication, This place is religious after the fashion of the Christian religion. Nothing of this kind is said, but this is the tone of the place.

Prof. B. J. Radford, of Eureka College, "past philosopher and lecturer," spent three days here at the beginning of the present season, preaching and lecturing, to the pleasure and profit of all who were so fortunate as to attend.

The music is under the direction of Prof. C. E. Millard, of Maysville, Mo. How much this means can only be understood by those who know Prof. Millard and have heard him sing.

Charles B. Newnan, of Detroit, pastor of the Central Christian Church in that city, preaches every day. His sermons are unusually practical. For such a place it would be difficult to compose discourses more pertinent. The selection of topics has been peculiarly felicitous and every sermon gives evidence of careful preparation. The preacher is a universal favorite with those who attend the Fountain Park Assembly. This is his fourth year as the preacher at this summer resort, and the indications are that if the present management continues and Bro. Newnan continues in health he will continue for years to be the Fountain ark Assembly preacher.

Missouri holds a prominent place on the program. This year Mr. J. H. Balmer and Miss Elsie Clark were present with five boys, natives of Africa. Mr. Balmer has been a missionary in the Dark Continent 18 years. Miss Clark is a daughter of missionaries and was born in South Africa. The five boys, ----, Zulu, Basuto, Kaffir and Bushman, furnished an actual demonstration of what can be done with the heathen-born by the faithful Christian missionary. Their singing was inimitable. Their conduct on the ground was equal in its tone and grace to that of any boys born in this good land. Their singing was in English and in the tongues in which the lads were born. It is no exaggeration to speak of Mr Balmer's boys as "The Great South African Boy Choir." If you are looking for an entertainment that will at once please, edify and help on the missionary cause, address Mr. J. H. Balmer, Buffalo, N. Y., P. O. Box

Of course, Joel Brown was present in the interest of the Benevol-nt Association of the Christian Church. The home of this organization is 5018 Cabanne Avenue, St. Louis, Mo. Mrs H. M. Meier is president; Mrs. J. K. Hansbrough is corresponding secretary. The association has charge of the Christian Orphans' Home in St. Louis. This home was opened in 1889. It owns property, free from debt, valued at $30,000. It has cared for 700 orphan boys and girls from 21 states. More than a hundred of the children have confessed Christ and openly entered the Christian life. This is a good work. Every one is permitted to have fellowship in it. Read what James says as to religion pure and undefiled, in the first chapter of his letter addressed to the twelve tribes in the dispersion. This is the kind of religion cultivated by the Benevolent Association of the Christian Church. Will you enter its fellowship?

One of the most remarkable men in attendance was Prof. Thomas H. Dinsmore, of Syracuse, N. Y .- remarkable, not in his personality, but in the message that he brought. He is a student and teacher of science. Dr. Dinsmore has the rare faculty of making the truths of science, not simply interesting to those who are unlearned, but positively fascinating. Two lectures were given. In the first the audience was conducted on a journey to the planets. Their location and peculiarities were described. Those who were so fortunate as to accompany the professor on that immaginary journey will probably never forget it. But the great speech of the assembly was Prof. Dinsmore's analysis of the human body into its chemical elements, in which there was a thoroughly scientific defence of the Bible account of the origin of man. This lecture was accompanied with chemical experiments which were at once illustrations and arguments. It was one of the few really great speeches that I have heard. I feel that I am conferring a favor on you by giving you the address above of Prof. Dinsmore. You may be able to use bim. Mrs. Dinsmore conducted profitable meetings with and for the women, in which instruction was imparted and difficult practical questions in connection with the home life were considered.

Geo. F. Hall, formerly of Decatur, Ill., now of Chicago, delivered his lecture on "America in the Twentieth Century," and preached. His lecture was well received.

Prof. James P. Whyte and wife, of the School of Oratory of Lake Forest University, near Chicago, deserve mention in this hastily written account of the Fountain Park Assembly for the season of 1900. The professor gave valuable talks to the preachers and Mrs. Whyte sang to the delight of those who love the best music.

At the time of this writing the assembly has not concluded its sessions, but it has gone so far that its character for the season is fixed. It is a great success in every way. B. B. T.

A Letter from China.

[The following letter has just been received from the office of the Foreign Society in Cincinnati, O., to whom it was sent .- EDITOR.]

Shanghai, China, July 9th, 1900.

The tragedy in North China continues to hold our rapt attention. Not much of an encouraging nature has occurred. Most people here have little hope that any foreigner in Pekin is alive. To-day, however, there was a ray of hope-a report that at least most of them were alive on the third of July. If they should all be lost one might search history in vain for a parallel, and no doubt such an awful crime would be requited with very stern punishment, judging by the words and actions of the German Emperor. Whatever their fate may be, great results are almost certain to follow.

MACBETH, Pittsburgh, Pa.

The Russo-Japan jealousy may come to a head. upon which depends the fate of Corea. All calculations are out, and prophe y is at a discount. Every one dares only to think as fast and as far as the latest telegram. Many are bidding farewell to "Old China," believing that a new era is dawning. Most of us hope this may be true. China's best friends feel that she has jeop ardized her autonomy, and possibly her existence as a nation. The whole north is in a state of civil Prince Tuan, the usurper, is in power. Nearly all the viceroys have refused to obey his decrees. Central and Southern China are still quiet, but the air is full of ugly rumors and ominous signs. People (natives) are fleeing to Shanghai by toousands. In fact, to day was fixed upon as the date for a big riot. I have, however, conjucted two communion services with our two congregations here, and so far have heard of no disorder. We have thirteen hundred volunteers and several gunboats, besides a fine police service. Every ablebodied man in Shanghai is enlisting. If the allied forces in the north meet with disaster it will go hard with us and with all foreigners in all parts of the empire. We do not look for this, however. We think the powers will be successful up there. All members of the mission are in their usual health. Nearly all are in Shanghai. It is not safe to be at most of the stations. Besides, being the hot season, schools are closed, and the work suffers little from the workers' absence for a time.

The conduct of the Chinese Christians is beyond praise. Martyrs multiply, but everything possible is being done to save their lives. It is said that two thousand Christians have been killed in Pekin alone

Every one is thankful for the friendly attitude of the leading viceroys so far. But no one can tell how long it will continue. There are but fifteen thousand troops available at Tien Tsin yet. They need 30,000 for an advance on Pekin.

Business is paralyzed all over China. A crisis in banking was narrowly averted. Interest has doubled. Business houses here will have to close for want of clerks and servants. All our native house servants wish to leave. There is a reign of terror among the people. Remember, this is in Shanghai, hundreds of miles from the seat of war.

It is thought this is at least the end of the Manchu dynasty. Let us hope so. Some fre-ly speak of partition. Our only fear is that dust will be throne into the eyes of foreign diplomats, and that the changes made will not be radical enough to serve the ends of progress. The Lord reigns. Oh! that he might rule in this land.

New York Letter.

Since writing the last New York Letter we have left the metropolis and are enjoying the vacation among friends and kindred in the Southland. Leaving New York at 8 o'clock on Monday, July 30th, a pleasant run of five and a half hours over the B. & O. brought us to the national capital, where two hours were spent in looking through the capitol building and the con ressional library. Any one passing through the capital city of our nation should not fail to visit these massive and interesting buildings. The capital never grows old to those who love the beautiful in art, the great in history and the strong in government. The city of Washington is interesting from many points of view; but after all else is said there is nothing there more interesting to me and thousands of others than the workmen of the Lord, Power, Bagby, Wright and Kimmell, and the grand work they are doing. I regretted very much that I did not have time to call on them.

A pleasant run of about four hours over the B. & O. and Norfolk and Western Railroads brought us through the lower part of the Shenandoah Valley along the beautiful little river by the same name to the rustic village of Luray, where are the famous Luray Caverns. Our longtime desire to see these subterranean wonders caused us to stop over night to go through them. The negroes crying out "Mansion Inn Bus!"
"Bus for the Mansion Inn!" induced us with many others to get in, and within a few minutes we were at the supper table and there fell in company with a Rev. Mr. Smith and wife, of Pennsylvania, who had come to see the caves also. Supper being over a buss full of us started to see the caverns. We found it to be a most wonderful place of endless charms and beauties. The caves were discovered in 1878 and shortly afterwards opened to the admiration of the public full extent of their subtercanean depths were not even dreamed of until many years after. Exploring parties continued to penetrate the seemingly endless chambers and labyrinthine passages until the exquisite richness of these chambers were disclosed and made accessible. Scientists, explorers, travelers of all kinds and from all parts of the globe are continually passing through these chambers and halls, and their general verdict is, Luray Caverns excel others in the combined extent, variety, scientific interest and beauty of their calcite formations. A party sent out by Smithsonian Institution says: "Comparing this great natural curiosity with others of the same class it is safe to say that there is probably no other cave in the world more completely and profusely decorated with statactilic and statagmitic ornamenation than Luray." Some one visiting the caves has said:

Entering the grand vestibule, the first emotion felt by the visitor is one of mute wonder. The mind fails to grasp the grandeur revealed in such a majestic manner until it gradually accustoms itself to the monstrous shapes, the almost perceptible silence and the weird influence of this subterranean realm. Queer shapes present themselves at every turn, aping grotesquely the objects of the outer world; now suggesting some growth of a imal life, now resembling some familiar vegetable formation or taking the shape and form of some creation of man. Glittering stalactites bleze in front, fluted columns, draperies in broad folds and a thousand tints, cascades of snow-white stone, illuminated by the glare of the electric light, fill the mind with curious sensations of wonder and admiration. Awe and reverence possess the beholder. He stands amazed in the royal chambers of the King of

No language can adequately describe the marvelous beauties of these underground houses not made with hands.

Entrance Hall and Hovey's Hall are adorned with statuary and stalactite drapery which for beauty and coloring, translucency and symmetrical folding are unexcelled by anything in the cave. Titania's Veil is guarded by many great rock sentinels of marvelous beauty. The Saracen's Tent, the Cathedral with its grand organ and the Bridal Chamber all bear striking resemblance to the objects for which they are named. The organ in the cathedral is indeed a wonderful object. The guide left us at a distance of about fifty feet while he went to "the organ" and with little mallet struck a number of stalagmites which look very much like the pipes of a great organ, and which when struck sent forth the sweetest sounds like pipes of some cathedral organ. There are many other things of which I should like to speak in particular, but can not do so now. Those passing through Virginia should make it a point to go by Luray and visit the caves. Those who love the beautiful and wonderful in nature will not regret it Having spent a few days at Lexington visiting my brother, Prof. J. C. Willis, vice-president of Ken ucky University, I should like to say many things about the schools here, but will have to wait until the next writing.

Fifth District Convention.

Another convention of the fifth district of Kansas has passed into history. In some respects it was the greatest one ever held in the dirtrict. The zeal of Kansas Disciples is increasing; they are realizing more and more the value of a wellorganized co-operative assembly. Let us commend their patriotism and zeal in due time lest they grow "weary in well doing." Another commendable feature was the high tide of spiritual life which controlled every sessions of the convention. Many were heard to say: "It is good to be

To the past or and people of Washington are due our sincere thanks for their hospitality and kindness. Sickness having necessitated the absence of Bro. Shields, the writer was chosen to preach the convention sermon.

The C. W. B. M. period was an intellectual and spiritual feast. Papers worthy of special mention were read on various phases of the Junior work. The Christ-spirit could not have been more highly exalted, nor the responsibility and influence of parents in connection with Junior work more effectively and tenderly pressed.

A Bible Chair at the Kansas State University is no longer a conjecture, but a foregene conclusion. The next issue of the Messenger will tell us the name of the dean.

The "Round Table" was next introduced. In the struggle to surround it some of the brethren and sisters got on top, some under it. However, it was spread with a feast of good things and all enjoyed the repast.

The Bible-school period was full of enthusiasm and love. Every valuable phase of this subject was presented and discussed.

The sermon by R. E. Rosenstein on "Our Strength and Our Weakness" was the production of a master mind, presented in a masterly way, and fastened itself on our hearts and minds like nails driven by the hand of the "master of assemblies."

The C. E. workers proved themselves wide awake to the needs of the hour. Those participating in the work of this period, save the writer, who was unexpectedly called to fill a vacancy, had certainly come up through the "valley of Eshcol," and ladened their shoulders, minds and hearts with many large clusters of rich fruit.

Last, but not least, was the church period. Bros. Paine, Lemon, Lowe, and Sister Nesbit Texas Letter.

In your issue of July 19 C. C. Redgrave asks where he can find the following quotation from Henry Ward Beecher on the name "Christian." It can be found in "Life Thoughts," Philips, Sampsou & Co., Boston, page 149, and is as follows:

"Christian brethren, in heaven you are known by the name of Christ. On earth, for convenience' sake you are known by the name of Presbyterians, Episcopalians, Methodists, Congregationalists and the like. Let me speak the language of heaven and call you simply Christians. Whoever of you has known the name of Christ and feels Christ's life beating within him is invited to remain and sit with us at the table of the Lord."

Athens, one of our best small churches, and one which has long been without a pastor, has at last secured one in the person of L. D. Anderson, of Missouri, and we extend him a hearty welcome to the Lone Star State.

Tom Smith, one of our state evangelists, has organized a church at Smithville with 50 members and according to the fitness of things. Peter Smith has been called to preach for them. It would seem pre-eminently proper that a church in Smithville, organized by Tom Smith should have Peter Smith for a pastor. A lot has been bought and a new house will be the next thing.

During the first two Sundays following the Scoville meeting at Gainesville, Pastor J. B. Sweeney had 14 additions. That meeting refuses to close. They have had 400 additions in 18 months.

Mrs. V. V. Murphy, of Crandall, has shown again that a woman can lead other things besides fads and fashions. Under her leadership a new house of worship has been built and dedicated to God. A. Clark preached the opening sermon and is now holding them a meeting.

Purvey has a new congregation of 20 members, organized by Emanuel Dubbs. Not one of our preachers had ever been there before. The outlook good for a prosperous church.

J. N. Crutcher and wife will soon make a visit to Kentucky and while there will hold a meeting at Richmond. Occasionally we send out our strong men to help in other states. Texas is not selfish; too big for that.

Rev. J. S. Gillespie, a Baptist preacher of Ft. Worth, recently preached a sermon on the 80th anniversary of his birth, in which he thus speaks of conversion: "What, then, is conversion? There are some things I shall assume without argument. I shall assume that conversion implies a change, that the things changed are the judgement, the understanding, the will, the affections, the life; and that this change is the work of the Holy Spirit through the gospel." I call that pretty good for a Texas Baptist preacher. You notice I say "Texas Baptist preacher," and I do this because these Southern Baptists are famous for their old-time orthodoxy.

Charles Carlton, president of Carlton College, is eighty years-young. He is as energetic and efficient as a man of forty. Others may accept the "deadline," but "Uncle Charlie," as all Texas lovingly knows him, positively refuses to recognize any such line in his case. I heard him preach a few days since, and his sermon was strong, clear, beautiful and practical. He is a remarkable man.

Sulphur Springs has a new congregation of 15 members, and an Endeavor Society. A. J. Bush is largely responsible for all this. He held a good meeting with 10 additions and the brave little band has determined to have a church. May heaven richly reward their courage and consecra-

Mrs. Jennie Clarke, of Luling, has devoted her home to an orphanage. In nine months she has received 20 children and has placed 13 of them in Christian homes. This proves that "pure and undefiled religion" is still a thing of this world. Such an institution is one of our most urgent needs and I hope this is the beginning of a great work in our state.

The sage of Independence fallen! Bro. Procter was never in Texas, but the people knew and loved him, and now weep that he has gone from us. A great man and good has been called home to his Father. Peaceful be his rest and glorious be his reward. M. M. DAVIS.

Bethany Park Assembly.

It was the privilege and pleasure of the writer to spend a few days at Bethany Park Assembly in Indiana. This splendid summer assembly has a history of sixteen years, and during all this time has brought rest, recreation, instruction and spiritual comfort and enjoyment to thousands four or five hundred people. Of course, there are comers and goes, and sometimes crowds run up into the thousands on special days, but the regular attendance in cottages, tents and at the hotel is about as stated above. These assembly grounds are only twenty miles from Indianapolis. This makes Bethany Park a splendid place for the families of business men from the city and towns around to get away from family cares for a few weeks and camp in tents or their cottages and take their meals at the ho'el. The men can join their families every evening, as trains go into the city in the morning and return at night, or they can come as their business interests will permit. For this reason Bethany is a very popular resort for our people in this part of the state.

The best feature of Bethany, however, is the happy moral and spiritual tone. Here congregate a number of the very best families, who possess and have in their lives everything that is good and desirable. This company lives in an atmosphere and a fellowship of its own. It is not only a happy place and full of enjoyment, but it becomes a spiritual tonic and stimulant to every heart. Those who are here are among the busy people of the world and busy in good works as well as the activities of the world, and when they come here to rest and to enjoy each other's social intercourse it is a great blessing to the husband of many business cares, to the busy housewife, and last, but not least, also to the children. The boys who have been in school all the year are taken from the city and towns where sins of all kinds endanger our children during the summer months and see the good side of life. So it seems good to be here, and all are conscious of their happy surroundings.

The program of Bethany Assembly is one of the most extensive as to length of time, ability in men and range of subjects of any similar gathering in our country. It began its work this year on July 19th and continued until Aug. 13th. Each day begins with a prayer-meeting at 6:30 A. M. These meetings are always well attended. At 9 A. M. came the regular morning lecture. These lectures were delivered by such men as Prof. John McKee, Irvington; Dr. Jabez Hall, Butler Bible College; Prof. C. B. Coleman, professor of Church History in Butler College; President B. A. Jenkins, and others The subject of these lectures were along the most practical and helpful lines. These names are sufficient to guarantee a feast that was greatly relished and highly enjoyed by all who heard them. The writer was very fortunate to hear Brethren Coleman and Hall in some of the addresses delivered. They were hours of pleasure and profit to all.

After the lectures, which did not always come at 9 A. M., there were addresses and sermons, both before and after noon. These addresses were delivered by such persons as Mrs. Helen E. Moses, Prof. C. L. Loos, F. M. Rains, J. B. Briney, J. A. Lord, A. B. Philputt, F. G. Tyrrell, G. W. Muckley, W. J. Russell, F. D. Power and others equally strong and capable of instructing an intelligent audience. But a program of twenty-five days so well prepared and so full contains too many excellent addresses and good features for all to be presented in a short newspaper article. One pleasant feature of the assembly was the night entertainments in song, concerts, etc. The Bible-school on Lord's day seemed ideal in its organization and work. John Q. Thomas, of Rushville, Ind., was the superintendent of the day when we were present. He is one of those quiet men that moves a school and stimulates others to action by keeping their own lips closed.

We were very glad to meet many of our old Indiana friends. L. L. Carpenter, who is the pater familias of this assembly and who may be said, more than any other one man, to be the founder of it, was everywhere in evidence. He seemed to be there not to be ministered unto, but to minister unto others. His ears are keen to hear, his smiles are quick to respond and his hands ready at all times to help. It is said that he has dedicated 500 churches and that he has a ravenous appetite to dedicate as many more.

J. T. Legg, the state mission man, was busy with his hands full of the work of the destitute fields of the state. In former years Indiana had a larger membership than Illinois, but of more recent years the latter state is catching up with the former and now the two states are running neck and neck. Brother Legg is doing everything in his power in this great work to stimulate every church in Indiana to plant a church in every town and community. We were glad to hear from him that thirty-five churches and Bible-schools have been organized during the year in the state.

E. B. Scofield, the former state secretary, is also . a very useful member of the assembly. He is here with a full line of just such literature as a people should read. He represents the Christian Publishing Company in the state and does a very satisfactory business with all who deal with him. It will be a pleasure to those who call on him at his office in Indianapolis.

It was very pleasant to meet G. W. Muckley, J. B. Briney, F. G. Tyrrell (now loaned to Chicago), and to have from our company W. D. Cree and W. W. Dowling, all from Missouri. We enjoyed the society of the Hoosiers immensely and not one of them was afraid of us Missourians. This highly gratified and encouraged, us and we think we will go again. Columns more could be written in regard to this splendid place. The work of its secretary, O. L. Orcutt, and its president, Howard Cale, should be highly commended and the restful quiet and sa isfaction of all should be further described but my time and space are both consumed. Can only say further, try it next year, and the eating will prove the value of the pudding. G. A. HOFFMANN.

Dedication.

The Christian Church at Dry Ridge, Grant ounty, Ky., has just completed and dedicated a eat, comfortable and commodious house of worhip, which was opened for public worship and nally dedicated on Lord's day July 29.

The writer had been invited to preach the pening sermon, raise the money for the indebtedess against the house and dedicate it as a place where the primitive gospel is to be preached and he ordinances of the Lord's house kept.

At an early hour on Lord's day the brethren rom north and south, east and west began to our into the town. There were vehicles, not mly by the scores, but by the hundreds.

The 500 people crowded into the house were nly a small per cent. of the people who came to ttend the service. After the sermon and the aising of the money for the indebtednes an old

Kentucky dinner was served under long sheds that had been erected for that purpose. Those of our readers who have heard of Kentucky hospitality and Kentncky dinners, if they had never enjoyed them before, had they been present that day would have said: "The half had never been told."

In the afternoon, after sweet communion service and a short sermon, the house was formally set apart by solemn prayer as the house of God. May it be the gate of heaven to many precious souls who may listen to the gospel's joyful sounds within the walls of this new temple erected to the preaching of the gospel and to the praise and glory of God. Bro. B. F. Cato has been the preacher for this church for some time and his work has been greatly blessed of God.

At the close of the night service, as a fitting close for the joyful occasion, one penitent believer confessed faith in Jesus Christ. We shall always remember the kindness of the brethren to us. May God greatly bless them.

State Mission Notes.

The dedication of the new church in Lincoln County was a great success. I have seen many a dedication crowd, but that exceeded anything I ever saw in my life. Not less than 2,000 people were there to eat of the sumptuous dinner that was provided. They came from far and near; not only our people, but all religious peoples were represented. It was in this county, twenty years ago. that I first tried to tell the story of love, to preach the gospel of peace. There were many in that assembly who knew me in the former days and who came to see the "boy preacher," as they used to call him. Well, they saw him but he is no longer a "boy." Bro. W. H. Hobbs is the responsible party for this new church. By dint of much sacrifice of time and money, too, he has suc eeded in building this house unto the Lord. It is a beautiful bouse, plain and unp etentious, but airy and commodious. It is 38x48, nicely and neatly built, yet strange to say it cost but $625. All this amount save $150 had been provided for, and at the close of the ser mon in the morning it did not take long for me to establish a reputation for being a tremendous beggar, but we got the money.

It was indeed a happy day, and I closed it up by driving ten miles and preaching again, to my old church, Corinth, near Foley. Twenty years ago this church called me to my first pastorate and I accepted. It is always a joy for me to go back to the scenes of my early efforts to lead men to Christ. But the smiles have tears in them as we miss the faces of many who were with us in the long ago-strong men and women of God. They have fallen, but thank God it was with their faces toward the blessed land. The next day was spent in a visit, if working hard all day can be called a visit, to my sister in the flesh, Mrs. J. H. Allen. Here lives yet in a good old age "Aunt Viny," a blessed saint of God who was my foster mother in days gone by. She is "only waiting." God bless

The next day found me at Camden Point in the convention of the Platte district. This was one of the most hopeful conventions of the year. It is one of the best districts in the state, but has been in the background as to aggressive evangeli cal work. But now they are bound to get to the front. Over $500 was pledged for the year and under the leadership of such men as J. H. Hardin, A. M. Chilton, T. H. Clapp, E. B. Read and others, they can know no such word as fail.

Again I am back in the office and gratefully surprised to find a few answers to the many letters I have written, but disappointed in their number. Surely, the preachers do not realize how short is the time to the state convention. Brother minister, has your church taken its offering for state missione? If not, won't you take it now?

Missouri Bible-school Notes.

Thanks to Mexico for the first quarter so promptly paid.

Smithville is another of F. V. Loos' preaching points and it is another friend to this work.

The Holt County meeting at New Point was not only a success, but every school in the convention promises something for our work.

N. J. Nicoson says put Pattonsburg down for a "V." while Anthony says the same for Altamont and Elmcre likewise for Tarkio. Jose Wilson says you will hear from Summit and Maitland and D. P. Lewis.

The Atchison County meeting at Westboro was fine. The reports were good and all were grateful to the Lord whose bounteous showers insured fine harvests.

In Bible-school work Orchid prides herself. The DeKalb County meeting saw why. The reports made were indicative of needed work in the county and this was arranged for. Maysville reported a good school, Orchid has one, and Union Star has the best in years. All these schools will meet their apportionments for this cause.

J. E. Davis is sacrificing much to establish the cause at Osborn and the Platte district will do them nobly in the matter of assistance as soon as possible. H. F. Campbell and a few friends of Goodale are pushing the work at Mission Point in Clinton, where there is a good Bible-school, and H. F. is with them through the week and on fifth Sundays. That is the thing to do.

The Nodaway County meeting at Barnard over the fifth Sunday was the largest county meeting I ever saw. Was held in a beautiful grove with "dinner on the ground" and nearly every preacher of the county pre. ent. O. W. Lawrence, president and F. E. Blanchard, pastor, were not unmindful of one thing needful to the success of the meeting I was given over $20 by the convention. Nodaway is one of our truest and most faithful Camden Point is not only a good place for schools, but is first class for conventions, and the district meeting was not an exception. A. O. Riall lodged all the delegates at the Orphan School giving us a delightful opportunity for social and fraternal greetings The meals were also served fraternal greetings at the school, while their bounty cannot be surpassed. It will be good news that the district will put an evangelist in the field and push the work for Christ. Brethren Riall and Stagner report bright prospects for the Orphan School and Military Academy, and these help the Camden Point Bible-school very much.

Those wanting the help of M. H. Wood in the south central district may address him at Van-Buren, his headquarters, while John Giddens is at Richland, and R. B. Havener at Windsor. Will you accept the apportionment?

DANGER IN EYEGLASSES.

Some Recently Discovered Facts Regarding the Treatment of the Eyes, by E. E. Bemis, Eye Specialist.

ing the Treatment of the Eyes, by E. E. Bemis, Eye Specialist.

Diseases of the eyes and defections in vision are seldom cured or corrected by eye glasses. They are simply an artificial substitute to temporarily relieve the strain on the eye. They do not remove the cause of the disease, and, consequently, can never perfect a cure. Too often it happens that they aggravate rather than relieve a diseased condition. Glasses act as a stimulant on the optic nerve and the muscles of the eye, and, like all other stimulants, require additional strength from time to time in order to keep up the artificial effect they produce. Each new fitting of glasses lowers the power of the eye, and this effect frequently results in the complete destruction of the vision. It is an axoim in medicine that to cure a disease you must remove the cau-e. Glass s never have and never will cure ciseased eyes or restore failing sight.

A new method of treating this common and dangerous complaint has recently come in vogue, which cures by logical and correct methods. It is not an experiment, but has been used with complete and never failing success for the last ten years. It is known as the Original Absorption Treatment, as used by the Bemis Eye Sanitarium, at Glens Falls, N. V. By their treatment the blood is attracted to the di-eased or weakened organ, repairs the wasted and infected tissues in its passage through the wasted and infected tissues in its passage through the wastences which are forming in or on the eyes. It restores the muscles and nerves to their normal vigor, and cures the diseased condition by removing the cause. This treatment can be used at home without detention from business or household dies attracted describing the absorption treatment and diseased conditions of the eye or defects of vision. Goldenrod

BY NELIA MCGAVACK.

Ob, goldenrod, fair goldenrod, I know what gave you that wondrous hue; An angel came from the realms of blue To scatter sweet flowers on earth's sod.

But, goldenrod, dear gold-nrod, One frail flower fell at the angel's feet, Fell down on the shining, golden street, That lead, through the city of God.

And, goldenrod, sweet goldenrod, When the angel raised the fallen spray, A golden hue on its petals lay As fair as the pathways of God.

And, goldenrod, rare goldenrod, The angel said: You may keep this gold, That weary ones of earth may behold How bright are the pathways of God.

So, goldenrod, loved goldenrod, When e'er your feathery sprays unfold Methinks they light like a torch of gold Our way to the city of God. Nevada, Mo.

Pain.

J. O. WALTON.

All who have known the exquisite anguish of pain are interested in every drug devise and theory that promises relief. Thus it is not strange that many are hospitable to the sophistry of the self-styled Christian Scientists, because of their claim that there is no pain ex ept as it is imagined. Drowning men snatch at straws, and suffering suffering humanity clutches at this imaginary straw.

The burden of proof rests on those who affirm, and by a syllogism based on false premises they prove to their own satisfaction the non-existence of pain. We deny, and affirm that pain is real and not the product of imagination. As proofs we present three facts: First, animals not deluded by imagination show all the signs of pain. If pain is a delusion, what deluded man trained the whole brute creation to manifest similar marks of fear, dread or anguish under like conditions? Second, a man walking in absolute darkness strikes the unvielding edge of a half-opened door, breaks his nose and cheats the dentist out of the extraction of a few teeth. He never imagined the door was there, hence, why imagine an injury and pain? Third, a man is stabbed in the back. He does not see the enemy, but he feels the shock. How does he happen to imagine a wound in his back and why should a surgeon imagine the same thing? If a wound be possible without pain, what in formedhim of the cut since, he could not see it? Until these are accounted for we must believe in pain.* Believing, we naturally ask for its author.

*Note.-Even the authoress of the Christian Science delusion believes in pain, her oft repeated notwithstanding. I denials to the contrary notwithstanding. I have just received a letter from Dr. J. M. Fletcher, dentist, Concord, N. H., in which he states that Mrs. Eddy did, in his office, have a local anæsthic applied when having some teeth extracted. Remarks are unnecessary. difficult to act a part in the dentist's chair.

Having disposed of the theory of imagination and reached the conclusion that pain is real, only two assumptions can be introduced: One is that Satan is the author of pain, and the other ascribes it to God. Impulse savs Satan must be its author, for surely God would not fix on the race anything so terrible. Satan, however, can only be its author in the sense that the knife which wounds is the cause of our pain. It furnishes the occasion of pain. but is not its author, for pain is in our members-a condition of the nerves and brain produced by an action on the nerves. The knife is a cause or occasion of pain. but there could be no pain without sensitive nerves and a brain. Likewise, the service of Satan furnishes the occasion of a vast amount of pain, but since he did not create our bodies he can not be the author of pain.

In ascribing its authorship to the deity we must remember that pain is not a thing, but a physical condition. Only by keeping this fact in mind can we learn its purpose and necessity.

Merely reminding you that pain serves as a restraint imposed by law against crime, that it is sometimes necessary in the proper discipline of a family, that God has used it as a means in disciplining the race into respectability and order, the individual into obedience to his benign laws, whether written by inspiration or written in our beings, and of the fact that God has imposed future pain as a penalty for and restraint on persistent disobedience, we proceed to another line of investigation.

We present for your consideration the proposition: Life of a high order could not exist without pain. We say high order, for it may always be impossible to demonstrate that earth-worms and other lower orders of life are conscious of pain. This exception, if it be an exception, does not affect the relations of pain and life of high order because of the facts that a subdivision of an earth-worm develops into a complete worm, and of the fecundity of insects that may belong to the same class. Man being the highest order of creatures could not exist without pain, if our proposition be true, and this being a fact, if life is a blessing, with all its possibilities here and hereafter, pain also is a blessing. If we praise God for life we must likewise praise him for pain. Let us see:

It has been observed that men who have partly or wholly lost the sense of pain care so little for the mutilation of their bodies that often they give exhibitions of selflaceration. Unless all should become superhumanly wise the same carelessness must attend all who become immune to pain, and an immune race would become a mutilated race, to be followed by extinction. Again, were it not for the pangs of hunger who would labor from day to day to supply his physical needs? And still again, who would try to relieve sickness if there were no pain? Or, how would we know that our bodies needed attention, but for pain? The pleasure of living may be urged as a sufficient incentive; but without pain there could be no pleasure. When the electrical forces are united in a body there is no electrical power. To obtain power there must be a division. One extreme implies another. In all things we see compensation. Pleasure is one extreme, of which pain is the other. The mean is dead matter. The nerves that transmit pleasant sensations must be able to report the lack or opposite of pleasure, which we call pain. No pain, no pleasure, and with neither pain to warn nor pleasure to inspire, self-preservation would virtually cease and a full generation would scarcely be required to extinguish the race.

Pain being a condition imposed by God, and being one of God's most important gifts to man, the question is pertinent: Should not we, like the flagellants and others, consider pain worthy of self-infliction or seeking? Such a proposition might be urged against the stand we have taken, but it is easily answered. Pain finds its use in warning against injury and harm, and only because of such protecting care does it become a blessing. God wills that we get rid of it by removing the cause.

Finally, without pain, the pain of his beloved Son, God could not have revealed to man the immensity of his love. Deny pain and you deny that God has ma ifested any any particular love for humanity; admit it and we have an exhibition of love astonishing, winning and saving. We bow in reverance and love before our God, "who doeth all things well."

The Passion Play.

On July 1st, at Ober-Ammergau, Bavaria, e witnessed the Passion Play, which was ttended by over 4,000 people from nearly Il parts of the world There is something eautiful and instructive about it. lay commenced at 8 A. M. with the Entry f Jesus into Jerusalem and closed with the scention of Christ at 5:30 P. M. There as an intermission from 11:45 to 1 o'clock. Vith the real play there were a number of ableaux representing Old Testament types f the coming Messiah. Six hundred and ighty-five persons took part in the performnce, 50 are women, 200 children, 125 have peaking parts and the rest belong to the ourts and chorus. The singing and the iusic and also the dignified, imitative Christ, ne apostles, Jews and Romans in their old ustomary way make everything interestig. Everything is carried on in a reverenal way and very orderly. The arrest, rials, carrying the cross, cruxifixion and arkness is carried on in the most solemn lanner, and so impressive is the scene of the rucifixion of Jesus between the two thieves nat even strong men and women wept. he resurrection and ascension are also very npressive. Every high and low critic ught to see the Passion Play. It is not oman Catholic, as I expected, but according to the letter of the four Gospels. Great lessons are taught and a wonderful impression is made on the mind. It brings out the human side of Christ and shows his sympathy and love for humanity as well as his justice against all forms of iniquity. No one should fail to see the Passion Play, especially every minister of the gospel should see it, because a good many things are taught that are not in the gospel by many preachers, and this will help them to be on their guard against error. We are all well.

The Cost of a Church Carpet.

The Chicago Advance gives the following estimate of the direct and collateral cost of a church carpet: The price was $800; but, as the women of the church raised the money by giving entertainments, the pastor's estimate was that, when all the items of cost were figured in, the carpet had cost fully $4,000. He reached this astonishing total by estimating the work, worry, nervous strain, bodily weariness and heartaches of 100 women; the heroic efforts of men, women and children to eat the things which were to be eaten, and hear, see or buy things which had been provided to extract money from them; the colds, fevers and other ailments contracted while attending the entertainments and the consequent doctor's bills; the money spent in other churches, for if they come to your entertainment you must go to theirs; and, worst and most costly of all, the demoralization of the church, and the curtailment of legitimate giving, which follow in the train of such methods of raising money. Compare this method of raising money, which is the method employed by women almost universally, with the methods employed by men when they want to build an expensive club house, or a temple for a "secret order," or to entertain a distinigushed man, or to elect a candilate to office, and consider the difference between the woman's way and the man's way; but men have the money and women do not, is the invariable cry. It is well worth while to trace why men have money in abundance for their enterprises, and why women have to get it by round-about schemes for theirs, to the basic cause, the inequality of men and women in all the relations of life .- Woman's Journal.

The Power of One.

In the church tower of the little town of Grosslaswitz, in the north of Germany, hangs a bell, and on it is engraved its history surmounted by a bas-relief representing a six-eared stalk of corn, and the date, October 15, 1729. This is the story of the bell: At the beginning of the last century the only church bell at Grosslaswitz was so small that its tones were not sufficient to penetrate to the ends of the village. A second bell was badly wanted; but the village was poor, and where was the money to come from? Every one offered to give what they could, but their united offerings did not amount to nearly enough for the purpose. One Sunday when the schoolmaster, Gottfried Hayn, was going to church, he noticed growing out of the churchyard wall a flourishing green stalk of corn, the seed of which must have been dropped there by a passing bird. The idea suddenly struck him that perhaps this one stalk of corn could be made the means of producing the second bell they wanted so much. He *aited till the corn was ripe, and then he plucked the six ears on it and sowed them in his own garden. The next year he gathered the crop thus produced and sowed it again, and the next year again, till at last he had not enough room in his garden for the crop, and so he divided it among a certain number of farmers, who went on sowing the ears until, in the eighth year, the crop was so large that, when it was put together and sold, they found they had enough money to buy a beautiful bell, with its story and its birthday engraved upon it and a cast of the corn stalk to which it owed its existence.-The Chinese Names for Nations.

In view of the present relations existing between China and the civilized powers it is of interest to know what names have been used in China to designate these nations. England is known as Ying Kwo, meaning "the flourishing country;" France as Fa Kwo, meaning the law-abiding country;" Germany as Te Kwo, meaning the "virtuous country;" Italy as I Kwo, meaning the country of justice," and the United States as Mei Kwo, meaning "the beautiful country.—New York Post.

Chinese Names.

An exchange gives the following translation of the meaning of Chinese names which appear constantly in dispatches from the Orient: "Tung means east; si, west; nan, south; pei, north; while tsin, kin, or king stands for capital or metropolis, as in Pekin (northern capital) and Nankin (southern capital). Tien means heaven, so Tienstein signifies heavenly metropolis. Ho, or kiang, means river; so Pei ho is north river; Sikiang, west river. Che means seven, so Che-kiang is seven rivers. Shan is mountain, and Shantung, east mountain, and Shan-si, west mountain. Pai is white, and Pai-shan, white mountain. Hai is sea, and kwan stands for gate, so Hai-kwan (the maratime customs) is gate of the sea, and Shan-hal-kwan, mountain and sea gate. Shang is a city, and Shanghai, city by the sea. Hoang is yellow; Hoang-Ho, yellow river, and Hoang-Hai, yellow sea. Yang means ocean, and Tse, son; hence the Yang-tse River is son of the ocean, and Tien-tse, son of heaven (the emperor). Ku or kwo is a mouth or pass, and Ta, big or great, so a-ku means big mouth (of Pei ho) while Nan-kow stands for south pass (from Mongolia). Hu is a lake; ling, a hill; hsiang, a village; hsien, a tax district. Fu is a prefecture; tai, a governor; tao, a circuit or group of administrative departments; so tao-tai is a governor of a circuit, and fu-tai is a governor of a prefecture. Chao, or kiao, is a bridge; li, a Chinese mile; pa, eight, and thus Pa-li-kiao is the eight-mite bridge. Cho or chow is a depot or stopping-place; hence Tung-chow, eastern depot (of Pekin). Shen is a province, and Shen-si is the Western Province. Yamen is a police station or official residence, and Hui, a secret society or club. Ms'ing means pure or clear; so Ts'ing-kiang is a clear river, while Ta Ts'ing means great pure (name of present dynasty), and Kwo being a kingdom or empire, Ta-Ts-ing Kwo signifies the empire of the great pure (China.) Ta-Mei-Ka is the name applied by the Chinese to the United States, and means great Amer-

Infanta Eulalie on American Girls.

In the United States the young women have reached the very acme of feminine independence. I like this, first of all because it is my way. When I visited the United States I found myself in complete accord with American girls upon this point of independence. It differentiates the American girl from her sisters of Europe. It has enormous advantages, and properly understood it implies the reverse of harm. Independence rightly conceived and practiced is neither harmful nor unbecoming. In Southern countries the difference between honest independence on the one hand and what is improper or perhaps what is merely not correct on the other is not quite comprehendel. National customs and traditions have much to do with this. In some of the older countries where social usages are strictly conventional, women could be induced more easily to violate a commandment of the Decalogue than a rule of society. The genesis of the various national customs

FACTS ABOUT CHINA.

We recently published a booklet, entitled "Facts About China," by Wm. Remfrey Hunt, of Cheo, China. Mr. Hunt has been for many years a resident of Central China, and is thoroughly a quainted with the country and its people. The following are some of his topics:

Vastness of Chinese Empire, History and Age of China, The People of China, Populousness of China, Climate and Products, Classic and Sacred Systems, Strange Manners and Customs, Some Absurdities of Heathenism, Lauguage, Education and Literature, Missions in China.

"Facts About China" is concisely and tersely written. The purpose of the author is to convinformation and to instruct and not to entertain or amuse. Nevertheless, the book is thorough interesting. A map of the Chinese Empire is included in the book.

regarding certain feminine proprieties may be traced to the difference between Eastern and Western civilizations. For instance, in Southern Spain, where Arab or Moorish customs prevail, women cannot go out alone without calling forth adverse comment. The Arabs, or Moors, as we style them in Spain, are very jealous of their women. I have known a lady to sit for hours in the house of a friend awaiting the return of her maid rather than cross the street alone to her home. She was neither young nor pretty. Where Oriental civilization is strongest in Europe women have the least liberty. In Northern Spain female restrictions are not quite so severe as in the south. In France they are growing gradually less. In England women have more freedom than on the Continent. In the United States, as I have said, the fair sex have reached the plenitude of independence.-The Infanta Eulalie, in Frank Leslie's Popular Monthly for August.

Faithful.

What counts is not what a man considers faithfulness, but what God considers faithfulness, which may be a very different matter.

Faithfulness means not only doing things, but doing them at the right time, in the right way, and with the right spirit.

A faithful man does not ask whether it is a small thing or a large thing in which he is to be faithful. It is always large enough if Christ wants him to do it.

A healthy man is healthy in whatever he does, and a faithful man is faithful in whatever he does.

Faith and faithfulness go together; fidelity begets and strengthens belief.—Christian Endeavor World.

The Lion's Sister. (Arranged from Thackeray.)

J. BRECKENRIDGE ELLIS.

The young and rightful queen, Rosalba. now set about forming a party in order to drive the hateful usurper, King Padella, from the throne that was Rosalba's by right. She went about privately from one nobleman's castle to another and they held meetings and issued proclamations and disributed all the best parts of the kingdom amongst one another and selected who of the opposition party should be executed when the queen came into her own. Rosalba's party was composed of old fogies, for the most part, who went about the country as fast as their gout would allow, waving their flags and calling: "God save the Queen!" and as King Padella was absent pon an invasion they had their own way for a little while. Her majesty having nothing else to give them made them earls and knights and baronets; and they made ner a little crown of gilt paper and they uarreled about the places to be given away n her court. You can't think how they uarreled! For about a year the queen's incient army pottered about as nimbly as heir gout would permit, but at last a very old count, Padella's most powerful noblenan, came with a few followers who cut, lashed, charged and pomeled amongst hem, took the queen prisoner and hauled er away to the usuper's dungeon. At last, fter she had been in this terrible dark place ever so long, the door of the dungeon pened and the terrible King Padella

The young queen wore her magic ring, so Padella fell in love with her, and as his najesty was a widower he offered to marry ner that instant. Rosalba declined his invitation in her usual polite manner, stating hat Prince Giglio had her love. Having ried tears and supplication in vain this violent tempered monarch left her finally, bidding her prepare for death on the followng morning. The king bethought him of pair of fierce lions which had been sent im as presents and he determined with hese ferocious brutes to hunt poor Rosalba lown. Adjoining his castle was an amphiheater. The two lions were kept in a cage; heir roaring might be heard all over the ity, the inhabitants of which, I am sorry o say, thronged in numbers to see a poor young lady gobbled up by two wild beasts. Black as thunder looked King Padella as he ook his seat in the royal box. The rightful ueen was brought out in her nightgown, Il her beautiful hair falling down her back and looking so pretty that the keepers of he animals wept plentifully. And she valked with her poor little feet (only luckily he arena was covered with sawdust) and vent and leaned against a great stone in the center of the amphitheater, round which the people were seated in boxes with bars before them for fear of the great, fierce, red-maned, black-throated, longtailed, roaring, rushing lions.

And now the gates were opened, and with a "wurrawarrurawarar!" the lean, hungry lions rushed out of their den where they had been kept for three weeks on nothing but a little toast and water and dashed straight up to the stone where poor Rosalba was waiting. Commend her to your patron saints, all you kind people, for she is in a dreadful state! There was a hum and buzz all through the circus and fierce King Padella even felt a little compassion. But his powerful ally, the count, roared out: "Hurray! Now for it!" But O, strange event! O, remarkable circumstance! O, extraordinary coincidence! When the lions came to Rosalba they licked her pretty feet, they nuzzled their noses in her lap, they mooed, they seemed to say: "Dear sister, don't you recollect your brothers in the forest?" Then Rosalba knew that when she was lost in the forest years and years ago these were the very lions (only then they were cubs) who had shared their den with her. And she put her pretty white arms about their tawny necks and kissed them. King Padella was immensely astonished. His count was extremely disgusted. "Gammon!" exclaimed his lordship. "These are tame beasts. I believe they are little boys dressed up in doormats. They are no lions

"Ha!" said the king. "You dare to say 'Gammon' to your sovereign? Ho, my keepers! Ho, my bodyguard! Take the count and fling him into the circus!"

The haughty count laid down his operaglasses and looked scowlingly around at the king. "Your majesty thinks me afraid? No, not of a hundred thousand lions. Let them come on!" And opening a grating of a box he jumped lightly down into the circus, protec ed by his sword and buckler. "Wurra wurra wurra wur!" In about two minutes the count was gobbled up-bones, boots and all, and there was an end of

At this the king said: "Served him right, the ruffian! Now, as these lions won't eat the young woman-"

"Let her off! Let her off!" cried the

'No!" roared the king. "let the keepers chop her into small pieces!"

"A-a-ah!" cried the crowd. "Shame!" "Who dares to cry 'shame?" cried the furious potentate. "Fling any scoundrel who says a word down among the lions!" I warrant you there was a dead silence then which was broken by a "pang-arang pang-pang-karangpang!" and a herald rode into the farther end of the circus.

"Ha!" exclaimed the king, "'tis the herald of Paflagonia. What news, my trusty Reigning up his charger in a most elegant manner the herald hung his trumpet over his shoulder, took a sheet of paper out of his hat and read: "O, yes! O, yes! O, yes! Know all men by these presents that we,

Giglio, have assumed our rightful throne, long occupied by our uncle, styling himself Valoroso XXIV.—hereby summon the false traitor, Padella-"

"Ha!" growled Padella.

'To release from cowardly imprisonment his rightful sovereign, Rasalba, Queen of Crim Tartary!"

"Is that all?" said Padella, with the terriific calm of concentrated fury.

"That, sir, is King Giglio's message. Here is his majesty's letter in autograph, and here is his glove!" And the herald executed a demivolte and three caracols and dashed away. Padella was now perfectly livid with rage. "Rosalba shall die in tortures!" he roared. "Ha, ha, ha, ha! Revenge is still dear! Ho! tortures, rackmen, executioners-light up the fires and make the pincers hot! Get lots of boiling lead! Bring for Rosalba!"

TESUS THE GOOD SHEPHERD.*

In point of time the present lesson follows closely that of last week. The parable of the Good Shepherd was probably spoken with direct reference to the sequel of the miracle wrought by Jesus upon the man born blind. Because of his persistence in confessing his faith in Jesus he was cast out of the synagogue, or excommunicated. Thus the Pharisees and scribes, who ought to have been faithful shepherds of the flock of Israel, had thrust out of the fold a poor sheep whose only fault was that he had gladly heard and promptly followed the voice of the Chief Shepherd. To these blind leaders, whose eyes were closed to all plain signs of Jesus' divine character and mission, the people were in danger of giving heed, to their eternal destruction. The Savior would show the multitude the way of safety and peace through walking in his footsteps. He therefore gave utterance to this beautiful parable, one of the most instructive in all the Script-

The perfect aptness of this parable is only apparent when we consider the habits of the shepherd life in Palestine. Travelers tell us that even to this day the features of this picture are perfectly true to the facts. The flocks are brought in at night from the fields where they have fed and shut into the fold, which is a walled enclosure with a gate for entrance and exit. While the shepherds sleep, the gate is guarded by a porter or gatekeeper who, in the morning, admits each shepherd as he comes to lead forth his flock. The sheep know their shepherds, and each shepherd calls forth those which are his own and they go their several ways to pasture, the shepherd leading, not driving them. We are reminded of the words of Homer, descriptive of the ordering of the Grecian fleet-

"Not with more ease the skillful shepherdswain Collects his flocks from thousands on the plain.'

These Oriental shepherds name their sheep as we do our horses and dogs, and the most tender care is taken of them, the shepherd often periling his own life in their defense from the attacks of wolves and lions.

Not such were the false shepherds of Israel. They were like thieves and robbers, whose sole purpose was to enrich themselves at the expense of the flock. Therefore they came not through the door, that is, they received not their authority from God, but assumed it of themselves; they came not in the spirit of the truth, honoring him who is the Truth, and guiding the flock into his presence. John the Baptist was a true undershepherd, and the people heard his voice. The chosen apostles would themselves become raithful shepherds, to whom the Chief Shepherd would give a crown of glory that fadeth not away. But these Pharisees and scribes are such as Ezekiel described (34:2-4): "Son of man, prophesy against the shepherds of Israel, prophesy and say unto toem, Thus saith the Lord God unto the shepherds: Woe be to the shepherds of Israel that do feed themselves: should not the shepherds feed the flocks? Ye eat the fat, and ye clothe you with the wool, ye kill them that are fed: but ye feed not the flock. The diseased have ye not strengthened, neither have ye healed that which was sick, neither have ye bound up that which was broken, neither have ye brought again that which was driven away, neither have ye sought that which was lost; but with force and with cruelty have ye ruled them." How sad the sight of a false teacher, whose ministry is one of cursing, whose care for the sheep is that of the wolf that devours. How many flocks have been scattered, how many lambs torn and des royed, by men of unclean lives and uncon-ecrated spirit. What must be the judgment of God upon these fa'se shepherds! Only less hurtful is the influence of a mere hireling in the ministry. To receive a support in temporal things from the flock one serves is according to divine and human principles of equity. But to make this support the end of one's ministry is to degrade it to the level of mere barter. The man who can easily turn from the ministry of the gospel to a more lucrative calling proves thereby that he had mistaken his calling. The hireling asks: "Will it pay me?" The true shepherd asks: "Will my ministry be profitable to my flock?" "The hireling counts the sheep his own no longer than they are profitable to him; the good shepherd looks upon them as his so long as he can be profitable to them."

The good shepherd knows his sheep and calls them by name. Every pastor should know his flock. He should be familiar with the home life, the daily round of toil or business or pleasure that occupies the mind and heart of each member of his congregation. How otherwise can he best minister to their needs? This is very difficult, almost impossible, in a large city church where the extra demands upon the time and strength of the pastor are so numerous. But this should be his ideal, and toward it he should ever strive. The Sunday school teacher that can call by name every boy or girl in his class, and who visits their homes from time to time, will rarely lose his influence for good over them. It is a happy thought that our dear Lord, the Chie! Shepherd, knows each of us altogether, and is not ignorant of the least effort we make to overcome sin and do his holy will.

"He knows the bitter, weary way, The endless striving day by day, The souls that watch, the souls that pray, He knows it all."

The good shepherd leads his sheep, not drives them. The best way to persuade one's congregation to live right is to live right oneself. It will be a happy day when men can say of every minister of the gospel what Goldsmith wrote of the old village pastor, that he-

"Allured to brighter worlds, and led the way." Our Shepherd walks before us and never a misstep has he made. To follow him is to go safely through life's perils, and to perform all life's obligations. If we ever hearken to his voice, and tread in his steps, he will one day conduct us through the gates of glory into the everlasting fold, where cometh no night, and where hunger and thirst are unknown.

The good shepherd lays down his life for his sheep. The faithful pastor or teacher will not spare himself in ministering to his flock or his class. Through sunshine or storm, amid dangers or hindrances alike, he will pursue his work faithfully. Not all martyrdom is that of dying. To lay down the life on the altar of service is far better than to lay it down upon the altar of death. We must give our bodies a living sacrifice. Jesus, the Lamb of God, first bore the sins of the world upon his heart while he lived for men, and then bore them in his own body upon the tree, when he died for men. He brought us life, and brought it more abundantly, because he first lived a larger life, a fuller one, and then poured it out more freely than had ever been known before. If Jesus so loved us we ought also so to love one another, and to "lay down our lives for the brethren."

There shall be, in the purpose of the Good Shepherd, but one flock, as there is but one divine Shepherd. The scattered peoples of the earth, then alieniated from one another, and often bitterly hostile or coldly indifferent, Jesus said should be finally united in him. This we see is being accomplished through the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ. Jew and Gentile, Caucassian and Mongolian are being brought into the brotherhood of believers. The crisis in China, sad as are its im mediate results in the suffering and death of many noble men and women, may be overruled by Jesus Christ to the spread of his kingdom. If the Christian nations of the earth shall take contro of that mighty empire, with its millions of be nighted souls, along every highway of its vas territory will soon pass the Christian missionary and teacher with the story of infinite grace and truth. The Good Shepherd will gather to himsel: these "other sheep," and there shall be round the whole world "one flock, one Shepherd"

TOPIC FOR AUGUST 26.

MINISTERING TO CHRIST.

(Matt. 25:31-46.)

It is a favorite theme with poets, this identity of Christ with his people. How often and how beautifully do they ring the changes on our Savior's declaration that he and his little ones are identical and that service done to one is service to the other.

Perhans none of them is more heautiful than Lowell's "Vision of Sir Launfal," in which the quest for the Holy Grail, that far-sought emblem of holiness, ends in finding a beggar at the gate, in serving whom Sir Launfal gains his quest.

We need not clothe the story in Oriental or feudal coloring to make it all equally true. Here in the rags of Western squalor may he be found of us, if we will seek. Nay, under an exterior seemingly prosperous does there often lurk the sore or lonely heart of the Master in suffering.

It is ours, then, to go about with open hand and heart seeking opportunity to relieve. A front beaming with kindness, it is ours to present. We are to take it for granted that at some point, everybody we meet needs our help; then shall we be in danger of missing more.

Kindness, in great things or in small, is the thing this world needs more than aught else. This it is which covers a multitude of sins; and one of our greatest danger is that in emphasizing the sterner virtues, abstinence from this or that evil, preservation of this or that custom or observance, we shall forget the root of all true, best service to the world-kindness.

Many a one there is who, at the last great day will surprise us all-and himself most of all-by coming up from a life of many mistakes and commoner sins into the presence of the judge to hear the words: "Inasmuch as ye did kindness to these, my little ones, ye did it unto me."

It undoubtedly is true that occasions many for well-doing will offer themselves; often enough will we be confronted by those sick at heart, or in the prison of loneliness and isolation, or heart-hungry and sore with neglect; but our difficulty will be the surprise to learn, when it is too late, that they were sick, hungry or lone. We are culpable, then, unless we go about with eyes opened and sharpened by kindness of heart. It is wonderful how love sharpens the eyes. It is a libel to call love blind. A love for humanity that is absorbing will open the eyes to the needs of humanity.

We are to go about as Jesus did, with eyes open, seeking occasion to do good, and taking for granted that every one we meet needs kindness and help, until the contrary is proven - which never will be.

Have you not seen such gentle and thoughtful people; people who seemed to go about scattering light like seed, always helping others, never selfishly seeking their own ends, but looking to allay discomfort, promote happiness, and all without apparent effort? They it is who are ministering to their Master. They are the Abou Ben Adhems who, in loving fellowman, who are loving and serving God.

The Acme.... Smelting and Refining Company

Offers to Investors for a Short Time Unequaled Advantages.

IT IS A WELL-KNOWN FACT

That a custom smelter, properly equipped and operated, is the most certain source of revenue in the mining business.

ITS SUCCESS

Is not contingent upon the output of any one mine or group of mines, but draws its support from a large number of mines in the district where it is located. There are 100 producing and paying mines within a convenient distance of our smelter site and at least 200 more would be developed if there was a custom smelter conveniently located to which ore could be shipped for treatment.

A CUSTOM SMELTER

Bears the same relation to mining that a grist mill does to an agricultural district, with the profits greatly in favor of a custom smelter. The usual net profits of a custom smelter are about $3.00 per ton.

WE HAVE GIVEN YEARS

Of careful study to our plans and know that we are warranted in our undertaking-the erection of a custom smelting plant. Risks which exist in all ordinary mining operations have been carefully eliminated from our plans. We have water, fluxes, an inexhaustible supply of ore and a clear field.

WE CONTRACT NO DEBTS. OUR MOTTO IS: CASH or NOTHING.

A CUSTOM SMELTER HAS THESE ADVANTAGES OVER ALL KINDS OF COMMERCIAL BUSINESS:

The product of a smelter invariably sells for cash.

The ore smelted is ample security for the expense of smelting. 2.

3. Profits are always large, often reaching 50 per cent. annually on the par value of the stock.

4. Charges for smelting are always collected before the "matte" or refined ore is delivered from the smelter.

5. A custom smelter has no bad debts.

6. A gold smelter's out-put never fluctuates in value.

A gold smelter is absolutely independent of any financial stringency, business stagnation, political disturbance, or other calamity which jeopardizes all ordinary classes of investments.

Our Board of Directors is a Guarantee of Safety to all Investors. —It is composed of LIFE AND WORK OF DWIGHT L. MOODY. By Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, D. D. Illustrated with reproductions from original photographs and rare old prints. John C. Winston & Co., Philadelphia, Chicago, Toronto.

It is not strange that a life so forceful in its influence on men and so fruitful in good works as that of Mr. Moody should waken a deep interest in the public mind, and that more than one attempt should be made by writers to present such a sketch of his life as would answer the d mand of the public for fuller information concerning him. Dr. Chapman was for many years a co laborer with Mr. Moody and vice-president of the Bible Institute of which Mr. Moody was president. He was a great admirer of Mr. Moody, and the writing of the life of his friend has been a labor of love.

The volume is introduced by a number of personal testimonials from distinguished men, such as Prof. Henry Drummond, Newell Dwight Hillie, F. B. Meyer and others, who pay high tributes to Mr. Moodg's character and power. It cannot be said that the treatment by Dr. Chapman is strictly methodical, for the work gives evidence of having been put together hurriedly and without very much attention to the order of events, and yet it holds the reader who is interested in the wonderful life from beginning to end. As one follows Mr. Moody through his early life and his early religious experience, which was not at all promising, and notices the remarkable development which he underwent, it is impossible for him to resist the conviction which Mr. Moody himself felt, that there came into h s life at a certain period a new and divine power which he believed to be the Spirit of God anointing him for service and giving him that almost unique influence which he seemed to exert over men. The fact remains that a man with no college education, with an imperfect use of the English language, with no theological training, with no extraordinary intellectual ability manifested in his earlier years, rose to a pinnacle of fame and of power as an evangelist above all the preachers of his age. It is difficult to account for this phenomenon except on the hypothesis that God chose this man to do a certain work and empowered him by an extraordinary measure of the Spirit to accomplish it. Mr. Moody's humility and self-depreciation made it possible for God thus to use him. A man less filled with the Spirit than he, and less under the control of God, would have been puffed up beyond measure by one-half the success which attended his labors. There is no evidence that Mr. Moody ever became vain of his power, or that he ever failed to recognize it as wholly of God.

Mr. Moody's boyhood life is thus summed up by Mr. Kimball, to whom he ascribed his conversion: "Dwight was a head strong young fellow who would not study at school and who was much forder of practical jokes than he was of his books." But he secured a place in Boston where he attended Sunday-school, became converted and later came to Chicago. It was in Chicago that he began his religious work and gave the first proof of his usefulness as a Christian worker. Mr. Moody's first work was in recruiting for Sunday schools. He refused at first to teach because he did not feel himself capable, but he was a great success in gathering in children for others to teach. Later on he opened a mission of his own, which grew into large proportions early became interested in the work of the Young Men's Christian Association, and it was through the medium of this organization that he became widely known throughout the United States. It was not long until the demands upon his time were such that he gave up his business to devote his whole time to religious work.

It is too long a story to follow him through his evangelistic tours of this country and the two remarkable tours of himself and Mr. Sankey in Great Britain. Nothing in the history of evangelistic work reads so much like romance as the marvelous meetings of Mr. Moody in England, Scotland and Ireland. It would be difficult to overestimate the influence of his work in those countries, in which he gathered all classes of men, including scholars and statesmen, as well as the masses of people, in his meetings. His evangelistic work was continued in this country until the time of his death. He has made a wide and deep impression upon the reiigious life of the world. Not in modern times has there been so striking an illustration of what God can do through a humble man who yields himself fully to the divine control and gives himself wholly and unselfishly to the work of God. His name is a household word among Erglish-speaking peoples, and while there are many things in his theological teaching and in his isterpretations of Scripture which many of us cannot accept, there are none of us who can fail to recognize in him the presence of the divine power and to admire his supreme devotion to the interests of the kingdom of God. Mr. Moody was no sectarian. It was not the building up of a sect, but the conversion of men and women to Jesus Christ, that was the all-absorbing passion of

Aside from his evangelistic labors, the institutions that he built up at Northfield, the school for girls, the school for boys and the training for Christian workers, will abide as a permanent and enduring monument to his memory. All this and much more is related in this volume by Dr. Chap-Such a life should be studied by those who would succeed in Christian work, and this work furnishes the material for such a study.

MAN AND HIS DIVINE FATHER. By John C. C. Clarke, D. D., of Chicago. A. C. McClurg & Co. 1900.

This volume purports to be an exposition of what the author calls "the conductive philosophy" as it relates to the nature of man and his relation to God. It claims to find in the Bible the only true philosophy and the only true psychology, and upon these it seeks to lay the foundation for a stronger faith in God.

It is not an easy book to read. We have found it exceedingly difficult to follow the author's line of thought and to perceive the bearing of many subjects introduced on what seems to be his main line of thought. The book is not wanting in evidences of scholarship and of literary ability. There are many passages of great beauty and of originality of thought, but on the whole the work seems to lack coherency. On this account it is to be feared that whatever of truth may be set forth in the volume is obscured to the average reader because of its apparent lack of direct relation to the main position of the author. If one has leisure to study the book very carefully we have no doubt that he would find much in it to whet his intellectual appetite for truth and stimulate the spiritual nature. We fear, however, that the work is not on a plane that will commend itself to the average reader. We are bound to say that some of the conclusions which the author reaches seem to us unproven, but on the whole the influence of the book, so far as it is comprehensible to the reader, we think will prove helpful. Those who desire an outline view of Philo's contribution to religious thought, and of his philosophy, will be interested in what the author says concerning this writer and thinker. The book is especially valuable to those who are interested in psychological studies.

Alabama Notes.

The conference at Montgomery between the so-called "antis" and "progressives" has come and gone. If no immediate good comes out of it, no harm was done. I fear, however, that in a sense the "primitive gospel" (at least some phases of it) has run its course in Alabama and that the bulk of our congregations are either in a state of "suspended animation" or are nearing dissolution. If the Disciples are to be a religious power in the state the movement must be "born again." I do not believe that this can be done by a compromise between the factions, especially when it is expected that the compromise will all be on one side. The "antis" are aggressive; the "progressives" must be aggressive.

It is a question any way of division or death; may be both in Alabama. I have always deprecated division and held to a conservative course. but am compelled to confess that division generally seems to be the only successful method of building up the cause, as evinced by the strength we have attained in those sections where it has been resorted to. "No compromise with 'anti-ism!'" I used to think a somewhat cruel cry, but facts show it wisdom. It is belligerent itself and knows nothing else; it will fight-it must be fought. It is to be deeply deplored that so much strength should be wasted over nothing to keep people from doing something; people in the main who are conscientious and anxious to serve God acceptably. The plea for Christian unity has not had justice done it in these parts. "Save me from my friends!" would be its exclamation could it make itself heard audibly. Its presentations have frequently been crude and coarse; they have too often been conceived in bigotry and brought forth in vulgarity. Several times I have had to recoil almost with loathing, at least with humiliation, from the uncouth and brutal attacks which have been made from our pulpi's upon the "sects," and I do not think that I am extrasupersensitive either. In Alabama we have mu h pure religion and undefiled; we have enlighten ment, we have common sense, we have piety, we have sincere desire to grow in grace and in the knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ in all the denominations, and to talk to people possessing such traits as though they were heathen or worse is an outrage, especially in the name of Christian unity; and I have heard it done by men of "light and learning" (?) in some of our centers of education and culture. I have found out why some people object to being called "Campbellites." Lacking the brain, scholarsnip and graces of that heroic soul, especially his Christian charity or love, they do not feel at home in such company and seldom refer to him except to charge that he was in his "dotage" when he does not endorse some of their peculiar notions and eccentric ways Theologically, politically and otherwisely, things are very much mixed. Hope sees a star, however. which shall lead us eventually out of our muddles and that-popular education-is rising in Ala-CLARIS YEUELL.

"Enlarge the place of thy tent, and let them stretch forth the curtains of thine habitation: spare not, lengthen thy cords, and strengthen thy stakes; for thou shalt break forth on thy right hand and on thy left; and thy seed shall inherit the Gentiles and make the desolate cities to be inhabited" (Isa. 54, 2 and 3).

"Enlarging the tent" anticipates the "breaking forth," etc. And has not this prophecy been fulfilled in the marvelous growth of our movement? Are we not breaking forth on the right hand and on the left? When God gives us new churches through the preaching of the Gospel in all parts of the land, it is a sin to let them die for lack of the necessary buildings. The curtains hang loose, and the work of Evangelistic Boards is wasted very largely until the curtains are stretched forth and stakes are strengthened by the Church Extension Board.

Ninety three families in Oskaloosa, Ia., read the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST each week. Mrs. Geo. Gilchrist, of that city, writes as follows: "I know the church will be helped because of the fact that such a large number are reading your paper, for it will surely guide them into a more perfect life."

The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for the remainder of this year will be worth many times its subscription price. There will be interesting news concerning the various state gatherings, as well as a good account of the proceedings in the National Convention at Kansas City. All this will be in addition to the many gems of literature and jewels of religious thought with which its pages will sparkle. And just to think you may interest your friends in the work of the church and turn their thoughts Christward by sending the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST to them for the remainder of the present year; and that, too, at the small expense of only fifty cents. If you order at once we will be able to send back numbers for August.

The death of C. P. Huntington, President the Southern Pacific Railroad, at his camp. Pine Knot in the Adirondacks, on the 8th inst., removes one of the greatest railay capitalists of the country. He had one to his favorite resort but a few days efore, and seemed in good health and exellent spirits when he retired at night. on after retiring he was seized with heart eakness, and lost consciousness and died fore midnight. Mr. Huntington was venty-nine years of age at the time of his eath. He was born in Litchfield county, onnecticut, October 22, 1821. His parents ere poor, and his boyhood was spent in verty. He left school when fourteen ears of age, having had trouble with his acher, and became a peddler of tinware. e soon developed financial ability, and his ealth, at his death, is estimated at not less an fifty million dollars. He early con- landed at Taku on May 29th, and on May ceived the idea of a great transcontinental railway and became one of the chief promoters of that great enterprise. He was the great railroad king of the Pacific Coast, holding the key to the coast states and controlling its great lines of travel. While he is universally credited with remarkable business sagacity and the ability to conceive and carry forward great enterprises, he was also regarded as a grasping monopolist who did not hesitate to increase his great fortune by exacting exorbitant rates for transportation on the roads which he controlled. His death has exerted but little influence on the stocks which he owned, as his property was in a condition to be carried on without material change or loss. At the time of his death he was president and director of the Southern Pacific Company, president and director of the Pacific Mail Steamship Com pany, president and director of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, of California, director of the California Pacific Railroad, director of the Galveston, Harrisburg & San Antonio Railroad Company, president and director of the Guatemala Central Railroad Company, besides being director of a large number of other roads, steamship companies coal companies, land companies, trust companies, etc. We have not learned at this writing what disposition he made of his great fortune, but the probability is that the bulk of it will go to his legal heirs, as he belongs to a class of men who know better how to make money than what to do with it.

If latest dispatches are reliable we are at the close of the great Pekin tragedy which has been one of the most remarkable episodes of the century just closing. It was early in June when the foreign ministers, with their families and official households, together with a small body of marine guards, were beseiged by Chinese imperial troops in the compound of the British Legation. There were nearly seven hundred foreigners, including men, women and children. Their guard numbered only about four hundred marines, representing the United States, Great Britain, Germany, France, Russia, Italy and Japan. This little Spartan band held at bay the imperial troops of China within its own capital for many week?, while they were under fire of rifle and artillery night and day. They succeeded in saving the lives of all the ministers. Their bravery deserves to be commemorated in song, in painting, in history and in the loving gratitude of the civilized world. The international guards above referred to were 31st they left Tien-Tsin by special train for Pekin. Immediately the flame of revolt spread throughout the Pe Chil Li Province and missionaries were murdered, mission stations burned and refugees attacked. On June 10th a force of fifteen hundred marines under Vice Admiral Seymour left Tien-Tsin for Pekin. The following day the second detachment was started, increasing the force to over two thousand men. This expedition never reached Pekin. On June 17th, the Taku forts were captured by the European warships. Later Tien-Tsin v as captured and the expedition organized which has resulted in reaching Pekin and in relieving the beseiged ministers. Thus we are near the close of the first act in a drama, the end of which no one at present is wise enough to foresee.

At this writing all of the facts about the capture of Pekin and the relief of the foreigners are not known, but some things have come to light not calculated to reduce the seriousness of the situation. While the ministers and foreigners are reported safe, less those previously reported killed, the witness of the ministers very seriously complicates the Imperial Government in the uprising against foreigners and the war upon the legations. Two of the three cities of Pekin are now in the hands of the allied troops and the third or innermost city is under attack and has probably fallen ere this writing. The Empress Dowager and Emperor a e reported first as having fled, then as captives in the innermost or "Forbidden City," and again as but recently escaped and retreating toward the west. Sir Claude McDonald is reported to have said that "the Chinese broke every engagement with the foreign ministers." Another report says that "two thousand shells fell among the legations within eleven days." The only food supplied the ministers by the Imperial Government, they say, were some vegetables, and these they refused to accept. Every effort was urged to have them leave Pekin, but this they refused to do, fearing treachery. China has now to be called to judgment, and the account she has to render is by no means an enviable one. Li Hung Chang is still appealing to the United States for a cessation of hostilities and a peaceful settlement of all their international complications and troubles, but the end is not yet visible. The complications are many and serious and the foreign powers can make no compromises or promises until the real attitude of the Imperial Government toward the Boxer uprising and the legations is fully

One of the reforms in political methods that is sure to win public favor, and to be adopted, is that of the abolition of the party caucus, and the supremacy of the party machine, and the substitution therefor of a direct vote of the people in securing nominations for public offices. In Wisconsin this reform seems to have already gained the victory. For four years ex Congressman La Follette has been agitating this reform and at the late Republican Convention he was nominated for governor on a platform which contains the following declaration:

The great reformation effected in our general elections through the Australian ballot inspired us with confidence to apply the same method in making nominations, so that every voter may exercise his sovereign right of choice by direct vote without the intervention or the interference of any political agency. We therefore demand that caucuses and conventions for the nomination of candidates for offices be abolished by legislative enactment, and that all candidates for state, legislative, congressional and county offices be nominated at primary election, upon the same day, by direct vote, under the Australian ballot.

When this reform has been crystallized in legislation as is proposed it will not necessarily abolish the machine or the party boss, but it will certainly rob them of their opportunity to control. elections, and to nominations in spite will of the people. Every movement in the direction of securing, by means of the ballot, an expression of the free and untrammeled will of the people on all public questions is to be welcomed as an effort to realize more fully a government "of the people, for the people and by the people." Every one knows that it is no uncommon thing for the will of the majority to be defeated under our modern methods of conducting elections. A great many other reforms must wait until this one is put into practice before they can be realized.

Ex-SenatorJohn J. Ingalls died of bronchitis at Las Vegas, New Mexico, August 16th. His wife and two sons were present at his death. Mr. Ingalls was born in Middleton, Mass., in 1833, graduated from Williams College in 1855, admitted to the bar in 1857, moved to Kansas in 1858, where, after having filled various positions of honor and responsibility, he was elected to the United States Senate in 1873. Mr. Ingalls was a man of marked personal qu lities and much brilliancy of intellect, but unfortunately and unwisely used these gi ts too often in contempt of men and measures. He held the office of United States senator for eighteen consecutive years, during which he had many bitter senatorial contests, the climax of which was with Senator Vorhees, and from which the popularity of these two noted statesmen seems to have swiftly declined. No senator probably ever indulged in more bitter and scathing remarks in denouncing what or whom he disliked than Senator Ingalls, and on this account had to his credit a long list of very bitter enemies. "The purification of politics," he said, "is an iridescent dream;" also: "The Golden Rule and the Decalogue have no place in an American political campaign." However, he claimed that these were statements of fact and not an expression of his sentiments, which explanation is due to Mr. Ingalls. But no man more than he knows what these sayings cost him in the estimation of his countrymen and his constituency. But unlike Robert G. Ingersoll, Mr. Ingalls was not an infidel. Though a member of no church, he said: "I believein God and immortality," and shortly before breathing his last moments away, with his wife he repeated the Lord's Prayer. sides Mr. Ingall's somewhat stormy political career he was not without considerable repu ation as a writer and lecturer. He was the father of eleven children, five of whom preceded him across the dark river.

The question of selecting a supreme commander over the allied troops in China, about which there was much diplomatic maneuvering, has been finally settled by the selection of Count Waldersee of the German army. Count von Waldersee served with distinction in Germany's war with Austria and France and succeeded Field Marshall von Moltke as chief of the general staff of the German army. Upon notification of his appointment by Emperor William Count Waldersee at once began preparations for his departure for China, but it will be several weeks before he reaches the German army in China. The dvance upon Pekin was not delayed on account of this appointment, and the fate of the ministers in Pekin will be known long before Count Waldersee arrives on the scene of action. The count is well advanced in years, almost threescore and ten, but is said to be well preserved in his intellectual and physical energies and enjoys the confidence of his emperor, the German army and the German nation. In the matter of the future of China he is said to have expressed fears of international trouble. The newly appointed members of Count Waldersee's staff are Captain Loeffler, of Saxony; Captains Baren Gemmringen and Guttenberg, of Wurtemburg, and Major Baron Gebsattel, of Bavaria. Count Waldersee expects to start for China some time during the present week.

Race riots are not confined to the South. Last week a race riot of formidable proportions occurred in New York City, in which a great many people were injured. Police reserves to the number of four hundred were called out to restore order. The trouble grew out of an attempt to arrest a colored woman by two policemen in which one lost his life. The arrest was resisted by a negro named Harris, who slashed a policeman with a razor until mortally wounded. This aroused the white people and the riot followed. This shows that the race question is not political or sectional. It exists in human nature and only requires an occasion to bring it to the surface. To prevent such outbreaks of disorder it is necessary to raise the moral standard of the negro race. They need more such men as Booker T. Washington and more schools such as he has established Tuskegee. They should not be abandoned mob rule, but rescued by missionaries a schools; Christianized and educated.

BUILDING FOR GOD.

God is the great Builder. He is the builer of worlds. The visible and invisible uverse is the work of His hands. He is builder of dispensations, acons and institions. His infinite wisdom conceived a planned and His infinite power executed vast system of worlds that move with subarmony in their orbits—

"Forever singing as they shine, The hand that made us is divine."

"Every house," says the eloquent author the Hebrew letter, "is builded by some of but He that built all things is God." Becaman is made in the image of God, he something of a builder himself. This qual in man is worthy of his being and nate. The noblest work of this world is that building—building a home for the fam homes for the poor, homes for the unfort ate and defective; building religious hor for God's people; building institutions a governments for the protection of the ple; building schools for the education of people; and all these to build character the image of God.

These men represented in the picture our first page-who are they, and what they doing? They are representatives of tribe of people who but recently were sla in Egypt, but have been emancipated God, who has promised to make of ther nation. Their leader has caught a vision God, and His great purposes concerning chosen people, and under his direction t are building a house for God. Since the are sojourners for the time being in wilderness, it must needs be a movea house-one that can be taken down ard up again. God has promised to meet w them, and this tabernacle was conceived: planned by Him, and the pattern was sho to Moses in the mount. Little did these n know of the gracious character and mighty purposes of God. They knew t He had delivered them from their cruel ta masters, and that He had made them cert great promises, and that this tabernacle being erected according to His will, and order to cultivate right relations with H They seemed to work as if they were spired with something of the greatness what they were doing, though they co not have understood its vast meaning att time. They were building, however, in faith that there is a living God, and that will meet with them in the place which has appointed, and manifest His will His power to them.

This first house of God for a meeting-pl between man and God, prefigured also, cording to the Hebrew letter, the Christ institution—the Church of Jesus Chr Jesus Christ, like His Father, is a gr Builder. He is building a spiritual chur He said to Peter, when that apostle had c fessed Him as the Messiah, the Son of living God: "Or this rock I will build church, and the gates of hades shall not prevail against it." But this spiritual edifice is made up of men and women who inhabit material bodies. They are required to meet together for public worship, and for mutual exhortation and edification. The gospel is to be preached and the ordinances of the Lord's house observed. All this requires material structures or houses in which to meet, which we call houses of God because built for Him and dedicated to Him. Because man has a material as well as a spiritual nature the building of these houses is an essential part of the extension of Christ's reign among men. Those who assist in building a house for the worship of God are building with God and for God. They are to that extent Godlike.

The prophet Isaiah, in a glorious prophecy concerning the future of God's people, exclaims: "Enlarge the place of thy tent and let them stretch forth the curtains of thy habitations; spare not, lengthen thy cords and strengthen thy stakes." Here are mentioned two essential conditions of all permanent progress in religious work, namely, lengthening the cords and strengthening the stakes. The lengthening of the cords was necessary to make more room in the tent, but this put greater strain on the stakes by which it was fastened down, and hence they must be strengthened. This is the twofold work-extension and intension: increasing the area of the influence and the number of converts and churches, and holding fast and strengthening that which we have gained.

In our own religious work we have probably done more lengthening of cords than strengthening of stakes. The evangelist has outrun the church builder and pastor. The result is, we have a large number of unhoused and uncared-for congregations. During the last twelve years an effort has been made to bring up this neglected part of our work, and with very encouraging results. We are not trying to do less evangelistic work, but more church building in both the material and spiritual senses of the phrase, because the two are very intimately and inseparably connected. A special effort is being made the present year to raise twenty thousand dollars in order to bring the total amount of funds on hand for the erection of church houses to a quarter of a million dollars. We give several pages of the CHRIS-TIAN EVANGELIST this week to a special appeal for this purpose. We invite attention to all that is said on the subject, and ask our ministers and members generally to give it their careful, conscientious consideration.

No department of our work is in more urgent need of being pushed forward than this. We have had a marvelous growth in numbers, and it would be the most appropriate recognition of this token of divine favor upon our evangelistic efforts to greatly swell our Church Extension Fund in order to assist in housing these new converts where they may be built up in spiritual life, and themselves become active builders in the church of God. To neglect these new converts who have been won to Christ, and the new congregations which have been organized, would be to give evidence of our unworthiness of such signal manifestations of God's favor. With a quarter of a million dollars in hand as a loan fund we can begin the new century, that is ready to dawn, with a solid basis for the further enlargement of our work, both in the direction of lengthening the cords of our tent and strengthening the stakes. This would require considerable increase over the offerings of last year, but this, of course, is what we have a right to expect as the result of a normal growth and in response to this special effort to reach a quarter of a million by the end of the century.

APPRECIATING GOD'S HOUSE.

(Psalm 122; Haggai 1:1-11.)

[Uniform Midweek Prayer-meeting Topic, August 29.]
CENTRAL TRUTH: The true lover of God is also a lover of God's house, the meeting-place between God and His people.

From the earliest record of God's dealing with men He has had some special place where He would meet with man to bless him. At first it was only a rough-hewn altar. Later it was a movable tabernacle in the wilderness, then it became a permanent temple in Jerusalem. But even while the temple was yet standing synagogues were established in various localities where pious Jews gathered on the Sabbath day to hear the law read and to receive instruction from it and to worship God. Jerusalem. however, under the Jewish dispensation was the center of Jewish affections, because the temple of God was there and there were held the great annual feasts whither the tribes went up.

It was concerning one of these pilgrimage that the psalmist sings:

"I was glad when they said unto me, Let us go unto the house of the Lord."

It was with a heart overflowing with pious emotion and appreciation of the spiritual blessings that came from the house of God there located that he exclaimed:

"Peace be within thy walls,
And prosperity within thy palaces.
For my brethren and companions'sakes
I will now say, Peace be within thee.
For the sake of the house of the Lord our God
I will seek thy good."

Jerusalem was, therefore, sacred to the Jews, because the house of the Lord was there, where He met with His people and blessed them.

Under the Christian dispensation we are not limited to any one city or mountain in which to worship God. Wherever there is a devout heart, there approach may be made to God and acceptable worship offered unto Him. Neverthe'ess, places of meeting and houses in which God's people may meet for worship and for edification are necessary even in the present dispensation. We are exhorted not to forsake the assembling of ourselves together, and this implies a definite time and place of meeting and a suitable house in which to meet. Experience has taught us that the cause of God languishes in any community where there is no house dedicated to the worship of God, where His people may meet and exhort one another and observe the ordinances of the Lord's house.

A special blessing is promised to those meeting in the name of Christ and uniting their petitions for a common purpose. This fact makes the meeting house or church edifice possess a sacredness in the estimation of religious people not possessed by ordinary buildings. How many tender and sacred associations cluster about it! There we heard the Word of the Lord preached. There we confessed the name of Christ before witnesses, and there we were baptized into the likeness of His death. There we often bowed in prayer with those we loved and our songs of praise echoed within its walls. There, too, we gathered when our beloved dead were to be taken away for burial, and there the promises and consolations of the gospel were presented to us for our comfort. Is it any wonder that we should love the place?

The absence of any suitable house of worship in a community of Christians, or a house in a dilapidated or neglected condition, would be sufficient proof of the religious indifference and lack of true piety of the people of that community. Sometimes the church building is unfenced and the swine gather about it and root under its walls, or it is unpainted and out of repair. Such a condition of things always testifies to the religious indifference and lack of appreciation of God's house on the part of the people who meet there. A church debt which the people are abundantly able to pay, but which they do not pay, testifies to the same thing.

It was a condition of things like this that the prophet Haggai rebuked in his time. The house of God at Jerusalem was lying in waste, not because the people were unable to repair it, but because of indifference. They were saying among themselves: "It is not the time for the Lord's house to be built." Perhaps they felt that times were hard, money scarce and each of them could see where he could spend all his money on his own possessions. "Then came the word of the Lord by Haggai the prophet saying, Is it a time for you yourselves to dwell in your ceiled houses while this house lieth waste? Now, therefore, thus saith the Lord of hosts: Consider your ways." prophet then points out the misfortunes that have come upon them and tells them that it is because of their neglect of the house of the Lord.

No doubt there are communities of Christians whose house is in a discreditable condition, and who are saying to themselves: "The time is not yet come to build the house of God." Many of them are probably living like the people of Haggai's time, in very comfortable and commodious houses, while the Lord's house is a constant witness against them because of its neglect and dilapidated condition. To all such this message of Haggai should come with its warning note, stirring them up to do so nething worthy of their name and their profession in the way of erecting a suitable place of worship.

But many will say, no doubt, we have a very comfortable and respectable house of worship. That is well, but alas! how many of your brethren there are in less favored communities where they are few and poor in worldly possessions, or where the country is new and the people have not yet acquired sufficient property to enable them to build who are without any house of worship. It is the object of the Church Extension Fund, whose call for an offering is now upon us, to loan necessary funds to such churches to enable them to build houses of worship, the money to be returned at a very low rate of interest when the church has had time to develop its strength. If you appreciate the house of God you will not only seek to build a house of worship for your own congregation when it is needed, but vou will be glad to assist your poorer brethren of other congregations in securing a suitable house of worship. Your willingness to do this will be one evidence of your appreciation of the house of God and of the blessings of God through His church. Let us respond to this and to every other call of duty in the spirit of loyalty to Christ and love for our brethren.
